SIR EDWARD SEAWARD'S NARRATIVE.

CHAPTER I.

WE had a long passage, owing to light winds; so that we did not arrive at Kingston until the 21st of the month. Our former lodgings having been sufficiently agreeable, and our brown landlady remarkably obliging, we were glad to find them unoccupied, and took up our residence as before. I was not now perplexed and overpowered with business, as on our last visit, and therefore sat down very quietly with my dear wife, after our landing, to make ourselves comfortable. I invited Captain Drake to dinner; and we dressed with some little attention to the prevailing fashion of society: but I would not again submit to the torture of a friseur; and therefore, after arraying myself in an embroidered waistcoat, popped on my trusty Adonis over my father-Adam-like curls, and looked sufficiently, I suppose, like a modern fine gentleman. Drake was an excellent fellow, but had no pretensions to modish attire; indeed, he despised it, and never could see me in my wig without a smile: I also could laugh at myself when alone; but before others, not excepting Drake, I took care to preserve my gravity and self-possession; without which, I knew all external marks of a superior quality would lose their value; and

I had too much mother-wit not to have observed how much influence a grave countenance, under a well-dressed wig, has on society.

On the following day I took our passage in the Phoenix for London; she was quite ready for sea. And after having arranged the matter, by paying Captain Tracey 500 dollars for our passage, in consideration of which he was to lay in all requisites both of stock and wine, I sat down with Drake, and entered on subjects highly interesting to himself and the settlement. I exacted a promise from him, that he would not quit the command of the Porghee without my consent; and in reward for the hearty pledge he gave me, I raised his wages from 3*l.* to 5*l.* a month, and promised to make him a present of 100 dollars on my return from England. I desired him to look out for a young man, of good character and otherwise properly qualified, to go with him as mate; so as to be an available person to put into another vessel, or to go any distance in the Avon, or to take the command of the Porghee in case of his being ill, or any other casualty. He was much pleased with the proposition, saying he often had wished to propose it himself. I then recommended him to take out a quantity of paint and oils with him; and, when got back to our island, to have the schooner and the Avon and all the boats overhauled under the smartening brush.—“Besides, it is good for them,” added I.—“Yes,” said my Eliza, gently interrupting me, “and let the venerable old punt be painted, Captain Drake; it is a much valued relic.”—“It shall be done, ma’am,” he replied.—“I admire your feeling on this occasion, my dear Eliza,” I rejoined; “it reminds me of an heroic people who were applauded by posterity for endeavouring to keep the old timber of some famous little ship together for five hundred years! I think I have heard of it from your worthy father.”

After this little diversion from our business matter, I proceeded to direct our friend to have the barricadoes and the gun and gun-carriage also painted. I told him I had given orders to Allwood to the same effect about the mansion; so that he must calculate and purchase materials accordingly.—“Now, Drake,” said I, “there is but one point more in which I must take a concern. My brother no doubt has arranged for the purchase of the cargo and all matters connected with it; but as I have thought it right to establish a military force as far as our strength will admit, and my brother being my lieutenant, I will thank you to purchase cloth and lace, and such other things as are necessary to make him a suit, to correspond as nearly as may be with the soldiers’ clothing; and that all may be handsome, get him a proper sword and hat. And, before you sail, equip yourself with a midshipman’s new suit; but bring me the estimate for all these things as soon as you can, so that before I go I may give you the amount. I wish these official matters to be a present from me to him and yourself.” Drake liked these demonstrations of military array; and said he would accept of my present with much pleasure; and also take care that my views and wishes, now expressed to him, should on all occasions be complied with.

On Wednesday, the 23d, I had a visit from Mr. Green, from whom I learned that at present much sickness existed in Kingston; that the fever was prevalent everywhere in the low lands of Jamaica, and the mortality considerable. This information made me very uneasy: my first fear was for my beloved wife, the next was for the crew of the schooner, and for our colony, if any of the schooner’s crew should be taken ill, and carry it there. We had not known what severe illness means, at Seaward Islands; and I confess, I never till this moment contemplated the probability of such an event. After Mr. Green took his leave, my dear wife and I talked over the subject.—“Do whatever you think right, my Edward,” said she: “it is required of us in all things to use circumspection, and the best means within our power, to avert calamities; and having done so, we may rely on the mercy and goodness of God to bless our endeavours.”—“I hope, dearest,” returned I, “the ship will soon sail, and under Providence this will be our safety. With regard to the others so valued by us, I will admonish Drake to take care of himself and people, and not expose himself or them more than necessary.” In the course of the afternoon, my anxiety and fears were a good deal allayed, by conversing with our hostess on the subject. She explained to me that the fever took new-comers only, chiefly soldiers and sailors; that native white people, and such as had been seasoned to the climate, escaped it pretty generally; that people of colour, and negroes, seldom had anything more than an ague now and then; and that the fever was never catching, unless it might be in ships and barracks, where many people were huddled together, and the fresh wind kept from blowing on them. I was happy to find her statement corroborated by others.

On Friday I embarked the iron chest, together with our trunks and other things. And having received from Captain Drake an account of the monies required for his disbursements, I paid him the amount; having done this, I presented him with a capital gold watch purchased for the occasion, which he received with becoming grace and manliness.—“This is a valuable present, sir,” said he; “but, either as a token of regard, or a mark of approbation, from you it is doubly so.”—“Drake,” I replied, “you deserve it, and my approbation and regard along with it. Take care of your health, and we shall meet again." He continued with us during the remainder of the day; all profiting by the opportunity, to discuss every matter of importance to the settlement that presented itself to our minds. In the evening he took an affectionate leave, charged with the disbursement of a few dollars among his men, and some small presents from my wife for her sister at Peccary Field.

Saturday, 26th.—Early in the morning, I settled with our brown lady hostess; and embarked, with my dear wife and our faithful little dog, on board the Phoenix, Captain Tracey. My first care was to see that all my things were safe in the state-room, which had been allotted to us. After this inspection, my next duty was to politeness; and we were introduced by the captain to a gentleman and lady of the island, who, with their family, were our fellow-passengers. As we were heaving up the anchor, Drake came alongside, and, springing on deck, told me—"The men desired to see me again before I sailed, and that, indeed, he had the same wish!" I shook him heartily by the hand, and truly my heart was in the greeting. Martin and Purdy, and the New Englanders, and the two lads, soon followed him up the side, showing every demonstration of affection to us in their power.—"We all pray to God for you, good master, sir, and our lady," said Purdy. Captain Tracey and the creole family looked at each other.—"Did you hear what that negro said?" whispered the wife to her husband.—"God bless you all, my good fellows!" I exclaimed; "I hope soon to return to you! and tell all the people, when you go back, that I shall think of them as my children."—"God bless you, sir!" was the reply all in one voice.—"And may He bless our good and kind lady," added Martin,—"all our wives bless her!"

—"Martin," rejoined my dear wife, with a parting word, "commend me to Mira and to her mother." Some bowed, and some raised their hands to heaven, and retired to the boat. I followed with Drake to the gangway, and again shaking him cordially by the hand, bade them adieu; and they rowed for the shore.

The sea-breeze set in about nine o'clock; the ship was under sail, and passed out of the harbour in gallant style. The weather continued fine, and the sky bright, until we got into the Gulf of Florida, where we were much annoyed by mists and variable winds. However, no accident nor circumstance occurred during the passage worthy of remark; and on Tuesday morning, the 17th of August, the ship arrived off Gravesend. Our fellow-passengers instantly set off for London, in a coach and four; but I contented myself by sending off a note to Messrs. Perry and Co., with information of my arrival off Gravesend; stating also, that I had brought with me some doubloons and dollars, and some Spanish gold and silver manufactured articles of value; of which I sent an inventory, and requested them to despatch a clerk on board to meet me, and to take charge of the iron chest, on the arrival of the ship on the succeeding day.

We proceeded up the river the same afternoon; and before the ship came to her moorings, Mr. Child, one of the partners of the bank, came on board, and introduced himself to me. After the usual compliments, he asked me if the articles I had enumerated were in the ship's manifest: and when I answered in the negative, he said he was afraid they would be seized; and even if we could succeed in getting them entered at the Custom-house, he could not answer for the difficulties that would be thrown in the way of paying the duty, and recovering them. "What am I to do," said I, "under such circumstances?

I have no desire to cheat the revenue.”—“The custom-house officers,” he replied, “when they get them, will not be very scrupulous about defrauding you of them altogether, if they can set up any plea for doing so.”—“Can they touch the bullion?” said I.—“If they find it in the same chest, they may; and I am not sure that they may not seize the ship also.” I now became very uneasy, and proposed to throw the gold and silver articles overboard, rather than risk any of the possibilities he had suggested. My dear wife was present at this conversation. “My honoured husband,” said she, “send for the captain instantly, and state the matter to him as it is.” Mr. Child opposed this measure, as rash and dangerous.—“It is the only one that can with propriety be resorted to in the present exigency,” rejoined I, “and I shall adopt it.”

Captain Tracey and I had preserved a good feeling towards each other during the passage,—he was an open-hearted, single-minded man; I therefore hesitated the less in confiding this matter to his discretion. “Put the gold and silver muslin, or whatever you call it, in your trunks,” said he: “and I will clap the rest down at the fag end of the manifest, as the property of Edward Seaward, Esq., passenger: they will admit every thing to entry but the gold and silver cloth.” The banker was not quite sure that the captain was right; but I acted under his advice, disposing of the tissues as he directed; and without loss of time, with the assistance of Mr. Child, packed the other articles in a large box (which the captain gave me for the purpose), putting a card on the lid, endorsed, “Gold and silver articles, belonging to Mr. Edward Seaward, passenger, Phoenix; to be entered at the Custom-house, London.” After the arrangement was completed,—“Well, madam,” said Mr. Child to my wife, "I think this may do: Mr. Seaward is happy in such a counsellor; and Mrs. Child will be happy in such an acquaintance." My dear Eliza bowed, while I took her by the hand, making that silent acknowledgment to her on my part, which, of all compliments, is the most grateful to a devoted heart. In the evening we disembarked, taking one trunk, in which was the tissue; and which the officer on board allowed us to do, on receiving a fee of 5s.; and that I borrowed from Mr. Child. He very politely accompanied us to the hotel in the Adelphi;* then taking his leave, promised to send a

* Several persons having noticed this name as an anachronism in Sir Edward Seaward's Narrative, the Editor, in preparing another edition of the work, having submitted the objection to the possessor of the original MSS., presents the public with the answer of her friend.

"The criticism is perfectly just. Assuredly the present Adelphi Buildings were not existing at the time Sir Edward Seaward took up his lodging, in the year 1736, on the spot now so named. Yet, that he subsequently speaks of the place by that name, in his Narrative,—as he may not have finished writing and revising it until full ten or twelve years after the Adelphi was built (for he did not die until 1774),—I think may easily explain itself. For that name would then be the familiar one amongst the young people for whom he intended the Narrative; the old name of Durham Yard, with its wharfs and warehouses, having been buried from sight and out of fashionable memory, under the new archways and other elegant erections of the enterprising brothers, after whom the place was called the Adelphi. With regard to the coffee-house, it has a good pedigree for its pretensions. A bill of charges, appended to the Diary, dated 'Durham Yard Wharfs, Nov. 7, 1736,' has this note on it:—

"'Good Mother Osborne's Good House of Entertainment, has two other good points: it looks pleasantly backwards towards the river, and opens conveniently forward towards the Salisbury Burse,—a noble structure, which some vain folk talk of pulling down.'

"This was done the following year. But the remnants of the old episcopal mansion of the bishops of Durham, and their merchant adjuncts, did not share the same fate till many years afterwards. Meanwhile, the old coffee-house and hostel, doubtless remained; and, clerk to bring the iron chest to his bank; who should also have in charge to convey our other trunks to the hotel, and to act with Captain Tracey in passing the gold and silver articles through the Custom-house. We were once more happy in seeing ourselves alone with our dear little dog; and we greeted each other kindly on the occasion; Fidele also showing an excess of joy.

About the middle of the next day we received our trunks, with a note from Captain Tracey, saying he had much difficulty in getting the gold and silver articles admitted to entry; but he knew the demur was set up chiefly to exact douceurs; and that, as it could not be helped, he had got five guineas from my banker's clerk, on my account, which had accomplished the entry; and as soon as the duty was ascertained, he would let me know. I was well satisfied with this account of the matter; but it did not end here; for in the sequel I had more trouble about the things than they were worth: a plea was brought forward, upon some old act of parliament respecting popish relics, and I know not what; in consequence of which I had to swear that the crucifixes did not belong to Jesuits, and that they were not for the use of the Pope, or his emissaries, etc. Nor is it quite on its being levelled also for something in more modern taste, we may fairly suppose would bequeath its good name and hereditary customers to the present one erected on its site."

So far the owner of the Seaward MSS. on the objected anachronism. And it seems cogent to the Editor, remembering, as she does, many precedents of the most creditable histories mentioning places by the name in use at the time of their writing, rather than that (which had become obsolete) of the time when the matter narrated occurred.

One reader thought he had discovered an anachronism in "The Arabian Nights' Entertainments" being mentioned as known to Sir Edward Seaward. But the objector candidly acknowledged that, on examining the point, he found he was mistaken.—ED.

improbable, if the laws against necromancy and witchcraft had not been repealed a few months before, that I should have had another string of oaths tendered to me, on the subject of obeas and talismans, as touching the triangular pieces of gold, and some other strange-looking articles in the box. The more oaths, the more fees: however, in about a month after I landed in England, I obtained the things, having paid in fees and duty upwards of 200*l*.

We remained within all day (Wednesday), walking out, only a little in the dusk of the evening for exercise; it being almost as hot as in the West Indies. Every thing appeared quite novel to us, and our heads were made giddy by the noise and crowd in the streets; but happily for us our hotel was in a quiet situation. On repacking our trunks on Thursday morning, we perceived that our wardrobe would not do. The mode had changed considerably, even from what we had seen amongst the best dressed persons in Jamaica; and notwithstanding our vanity-despising humility of heart, we could not resist the desire of dressing like other gentry of easy fortune. While we were conning over this matter, Mr. and Mrs. Child paid us a visit; and after the ceremonies of compliment were passed, my dear wife, with her usual ingenuousness, told her visiter how much she would be obliged for a little counsel on a subject we had been discussing; adding, "When we make ourselves look like other people, I shall be happy to return your kind visit."—"My dear Mrs. Seaward," replied our new acquaintance, "I shall be too happy, in assisting you to ruin your husband in any way!" My Eliza looked planet-struck; at length, recovering from her astonishment, asked what she was to understand by such a declaration? "Nothing," replied Mrs. Child, laughing; "c'est une façon de parler:" you shall go with me now in my carriage, and we will order whatever you wish." My sweet Eliza thanked her with great courtesy; but said, if she would have the kindness to send a milliner and mantua-maker to her, that was all the trouble she could think of putting upon her, but for which she would be truly obliged. Her visiter pressed her much to accompany her, but in vain. The giddy Mrs. Child little knew the steady purpose of the one she was endeavouring to persuade to enter on a project, where a phantom so hideous at the outset, if it were nothing more than a phantom, had been held up to her mind. As this was a visit of ceremony, I said nothing to Mr. Child on business; and after rather a longer stay than ceremony required, the lady finding her importunities unavailing, at length rose, and they took their leave. "Many thanks to Mrs. Child!" said my dear Eliza, as we heard their coach drive away. "Jest and earnest not unfrequently are like the shadow and the substance. I have seen the shadow—it shall be my care to avoid the substance—I must be on my guard I perceive with that lady." I smiled, but endeavoured to convince my Eliza that nothing was meant; that it was an idle flourish of the lady, and ought to be passed by as such: but she smiled in her turn, reminding me of my own maxim in other matters, as to the excellent quality of caution, and begged leave to be permitted to exercise it on this occasion.

Before dinner-time the milliner and mantua-maker arrived; and also a tailor I had sent for. After a long consultation, and much discussion with these important personages, all points were at length settled; and on Saturday evening our undress suits came home. On Sunday morning we prepared for church, a happiness looked forward to by us with pleasure, ever since our arrival; and in truth we much needed some spiritual help, through the ordinary means of grace: for we felt the high tone of devotional feeling much subdued, since we quitted our intertropical paradise. My dear wife being dressed in the new mode, found great difficulty in walking with high heels, not having worn any for more than two years, and those were low compared with the present mode. Her farthingale too was cumbrous, and altogether she felt very uncomfortable; a little black hat with feathers, being the only tolerable part of her attire. I had less to complain of; the good taste of my Eliza having decided for me against lace. My suit, therefore, was a plain one, for which I was thankful; deep ruffles had been appended to my shirts, at the breast and wrists; my knee and shoe buckles were handsome; and as I would not submit to the torture of a toupee, my head was accommodated with a morning peruke in tie; and a plain hat, with a silver loop and button. Thus attired, we attended divine service in a hired carriage, at the church of St. Martin-le-Grand; and on our return to the hotel, after having dined, we endeavoured to keep alive the good habit of reading the Scriptures.

On Monday, we returned the visit of Mr. and Mrs. Child, and left our names, they not being at home. I then proceeded to Lombard Street, where I met Mr. Perry, who took me into an inner room, leaving Mrs. Seaward the while in the carriage at the door. He lost no time in compliments, but proceeded immediately to converse on business: said he had to congratulate both himself and me, on his judgment in vesting my money in the three per cent. South Sea transferable stock; for that the fours would now certainly soon be paid off, to the great loss of the holders: that the threes had advanced, since he made the purchase for me in May last year, from 83 to 99, which latter sum was the quotation at Change Alley this day; and although the fours had also risen considerably, namely from 105 to 114, yet whenever the ministry found themselves able to do it,—which they might accomplish this day, if they knew how to go about it,—they could pay off every hundred, with a corresponding hundred in money; that is, with a 100*l.* three per cent. stock, and the additional bonus of 1*l.* or 2*l.* “But,” continued he, “there are wheels within wheels, Mr. Seaward; and that which ought to grease the large wheel, is made use of to grease the small ones. I am a Whig, sir, and a supporter of the King’s government; but there is a want of principle in the men at the head of affairs, that would disgrace Change Alley. The truth is, men in office too frequently sacrifice principle to a momentary expediency, which to me is no small evidence of poor talents.” Having said this with some degree of warmth, he apologised for having allowed himself to quit the subject of our business; but the truth, I believe, was, he had taken some pains to advise the minister on the subject of paying off the four per cent. stock; and his good offices having been treated rather negligently, he was piqued, and could not suppress his indignation.

I however thought the present a favourable opportunity to mention my wish to purchase a grant of the islands, and accordingly I broached the subject to him. “There will be some difficulty in it, I suppose,” he replied; “yet it is not three years ago, since grants of land in the island of St. Christopher’s, were given, to the amount of 40,000*l.*, to portion off the Princess Royal, on her marriage with the Prince of Orange.”—“But how shall I set about it?” I asked. He paused a little, then said, “There are so many ways, that I am at a loss how to direct you: if there was but the King’s highway, I should not then hesitate to point out the road. Excuse me, Mr. Seaward,”

continued he, after another short pause, "but would you object to wade through dirty water to accomplish this business; or is it your intention to go to it simply as a man of business, and in that way to put it to issue?"—"As a matter of business," I replied. "I will not approach the minister through any dirty channels. The truth is, Mr. Perry, I desire to accomplish the business with no other view, and for no other purpose, than securing the poor people already there, in their little possessions, made somewhat valuable to them by their own labour, and my patronage; but with regard to my own advantage, I would freely bind myself to give all the money I may ever derive from it, to the minister's lackey, or to any one else he might choose to appoint."—"Give me your hand, sir," said Old Perry; "I will endeavour to negotiate for you; but in these times, a suspicion of indirect interest in the thing, will not be lost sight of; and until Sir Robert Walpole can be induced to see it as it is, he will suspect it to be something of more importance than you are disposed to admit; and so withhold the grant, until he be satisfied in some way or other on the subject." I had no argument to offer against this, and therefore finished by accepting his kind offices in the business: adding, that I would rest the result on his endeavours, and my own integrity of intention.

This consultation being brought to a close, he urged me to invest the doubloons and dollars I had brought with me to England, in the three per cents.; but I told him it was probable I should have occasion for the whole money, and would therefore allow it to remain in Spanish coin. "Do not do that," said he; "send it to market; it will never bring a better price; and I will then place the amount to your credit, and allow you two per cent. for it; as I have hitherto done for all moneys above one hundred pounds, and it will be then equally at your command as now." I did not hesitate, and fixed the next day to count out the doubloons and dollars, for the purpose of converting them into current money; I then shook the old gentleman cordially by the hand, and took my leave,—a favourable impression being made, I believe, on both sides.

My Eliza was not tired waiting for me, but she was glad to see me again; and as I stepped into the coach, my eyes were met by her endearing smile. "My Edward," said she, "I thought I had lost you." As we drove back to the hotel, I would have recounted to her all that had passed between Mr. Perry and myself, but the noise of the wheels, and of carts and other carriages, and of people bawling about the streets all sorts of things to sell, and chairs to mend, and bellows to mend, as if the crier himself had a pair of blacksmith's bellows within him, she could not make out a single sentence I uttered; I therefore covered my mouth with my hand, which diverted her a good deal, and placing my other hand round her waist to keep her steady, the rough-going coach jolted along, until at length we reached our quiet hotel.

While dinner was getting ready, I detailed the banker's conversation, with which she was much pleased; observing, that it had been conducted quite in the way she liked, and she was "glad Mr. Perry showed his colours," using an expression to which she had been much accustomed at our dear far-distant home, when Drake and I were discussing maritime matters; and she ventured to hope, from what had passed, that through the agency of Mr. Perry the business would be done, if it could be done at all.

After dinner, Mother Osborne, our hostess, came in,

with many courtesies and apologies, saying there was a tirewoman without, she could recommend, and if the Lady Seaward would see her, she should feel obliged. (Mrs. Osborne was an unconscious prophetess.) My dear wife could not resist this; and where is the wife, under similar circumstances, that could? Madame Filibert was introduced, and she commenced her address in French. When she had proceeded for a considerable time with the complimentary prologue, in which "milady" and "beaucoup d'honneur" were repeated twenty times, my simple-minded Eliza told her she did not understand French; and therefore would only trouble her to show some of the head-dresses, if she had brought any with her, one of which, perhaps, she might take to oblige Mrs. Osborne. Two women were now called in, carrying a large covered wicker-basket, out of which were brought indescribable things: they were placed severally on the table; and, to my great amusement, Madame Filibert took them up one after another, putting them on her own head before the looking-glass. One was charmante, another magnifique, a third superbe; but the fourth—O milady, regardez celle-là; c'est une tire tête unique. J'avois faite la même pour sa Majeste la Reine. It certainly was handsome, being made chiefly of gold tissue, but of a quality far inferior to that we had found in the cave. After some parley, my wife purchased it. "Now," said she, "Madame Filibert, is this the richest tissue of gold that is made?" The tirewoman answered in tolerable English, that nothing in Europe could surpass it; if she did not speak true, she would give it for nothing. "I will not tie you to your word," returned my Eliza, "but I will show you a piece of tissue, with which it cannot be compared." She then went up to the bed-room, and brought down a piece of the plain gold; two of the four being richly wrought. The tirewoman, at sight of it, expressed her astonishment, exclaiming, "it was all gold! there was never anything like it seen in Europe! it was certainly from Persia, or China, or the gold mines." She anxiously desired a little bit of it, which my dear wife would have given to her; but at my whisper, that some possible mischief might come out of it, she politely declined complying with Madame Filibert's wish: so the business concluded with her, by paying for the tire she had chosen; on which Madame, with her women, made their obeisance, and departed. This scene afforded us abundance of pleasantries for the evening.

On the following day, we received an invitation to dinner from Mr. and Mrs. Child, and in consequence care was taken that our dress clothes should be brought home in time. When the day arrived, we dressed: my dear wife's brocade was rich, and no doubt highly fashionable; the hoop large; the ruffles were of blonde, and she wore the tire purchased from Madame Filibert. I had presented her with a diamond necklace and earrings, the price of which is the only secret I ever kept from her in my life; but she placed it to the right account, and accepted them, as I gave them, with feelings of deep regard. My suit was embroidered velvet, with white silk stockings, and a peruke in the best mode. As I took her hand to lead her down stairs to the carriage, she looked up at me with her own sweet smile, saying, "My Edward has given me a diamond necklace and earrings,—will he stop at the jeweller's, and give his Eliza a diamond ring also?"—"With the greatest pleasure, my beloved," I replied. The coachman was then ordered to stop on Ludgate Hill, at Harding's, where we both got out; and I was proceeding to choose for her a ring. "No, Edward," she said, "I must be selfish for once; it must be of my own choosing, and the finest brilliant I can find." In a little time she fixed her eye on a splendid gem, elegantly set, but not a lady's ring; then taking my hand she put it on my finger, saying, "It is here I shall always love to see my brilliant;" then raising my hand to her lips, added to it a mark of her affection more precious than the gem itself.

We had not from thence far to drive to Mr. Child's, so that I gave a few minutes to Mr. Harding, as a proper finish to the affair: and notwithstanding the delay occasioned by this agreeable adventure, we arrived in very good time.

The company were numerous, and somewhat gorgeously attired; the dinner was sumptuous; and the liveries of the servants vied with their masters in the richness of the lace on their coats. We got through the ceremonies pretty well; but felt no inclination to copy the tone of conversation that was kept up afterwards. The subjects were low, and some of the expressions worse than low: the ribaldry of Fielding seemed to be the standard of wit, and some of the coarsest jokes of the Dean, the signal for a general laugh; the ladies drank rather freely, and few of them were without a snuff-box. I perceived early in the afternoon how much my dear Eliza was disgusted with the society around her, although the ladies commended her fine taste, and more than one gentleman told her she was an angel. In the evening, Mrs. Child pressed her to take a seat at the quadrille tables; and although she knew little of the game, politeness obliged her not to refuse. In the course of the evening a gentleman, Mr. Powis, who with myself had refused cards, engaged me in conversation. He talked on a variety of political subjects, with the merits of which I was totally unacquainted; I however listened with great attention, being glad of an opportunity to pick up information in any way; and as I listened with attention, so I took care not to disclose my ignorance, but masked it by a well-timed assent; now and then adding a short, but, I hope, pertinent remark. He told Mr. Child the next day, I was one of the most sensible men he had conversed with for many years. The truth is, he went on flowingly from subject to subject for an hour, without my ever crossing his path; and if I stopped him a moment, it was only to set him off again with increased vigour and self-approbation; and therefore, forsooth, I was the most sensible man he had conversed with for many years! A moralist might adduce a maxim by no means contemptible from this man's folly:—It is easier to listen, than to talk, yourself into some people's good opinion. However, Mr. Powis took a fancy to me in consequence, and afterwards, if I am not mistaken, interested himself to serve me.

At ten o'clock we returned home. I was well enough pleased with our entertainment; but my dear wife found little to approve, and much to condemn. She delicately observed, blushing while she made the remark, that there seemed to be a frightful looseness of thought amongst them all, in every way; and she would not conceal from me, that she had no doubt there was cheating at the card-table. One of the ladies having been detected in hiding spadille, made a joke of it, which was passed by as a thing mighty clever, if other people were blind or stupid enough not to perceive it. "I will play no more cards with such persons, my dear Edward," she continued; "and, unless it be to oblige you, or to forward our views in getting the grant for our people, I would desire to avoid all such company in future."

During the remainder of the week I was engaged in business, partly at the Custom-house, on the subject of the gold and silver articles. But my first object was to ascertain the state of my finances. I had called at the Bank agreeable to promise, and counted out 1900 doubloons and 3000 dollars from the iron chest, reserving 30 of the gold pieces and 300 of the dollars which remained, for my own use, lest I might at some future day require them. The doubloons had sold for 6650*l.*, and the dollars for 675*l.* and passed to my credit. I now received my account current, in which I perceived 67,424*l.* in three per cent, S.S.T. stock, purchased at 83 in May of last year; and 2105*l.* in the same stock, bought in January last at 95; the whole cost in money being 58,000*l.* After the statement of other items, pro and con, there appeared a balance of 9554*l.* 11*s.* 6*d.* to my credit this day, viz. the 28th of August, 1736. So that without taking the value of the contents of the box at the Custom-house into consideration, or my brother's debt to me, I could estimate my fortune at nearly 68,000*l.* sterling, and my income from government securities upwards of 2000*l.* a year; each half-yearly dividend being 1074*l.* 2*s.* Having thus ascertained the state and condition of my money concerns, I felt myself prepared to square my expenditures accordingly, although such conduct might not be quite à la mode.

On Sunday we attended church, morning and evening. And early in the week had the pleasure to receive letters from dear Mr. Goldsmith and my sisters, in acknowledgment of some we wrote immediately after our arrival. They hoped to see us soon; and we as sincerely hoped and desired to escape from the vortex we saw gathering round us, to the peaceful retreat of our virtuous, gentle, and dearly loved friends.

Some of the persons we met at Mr. Child's dinner, called on us; they were visits merely of ceremony, which in due time we returned. But Mrs. Child had been teasing my wife to take a house, and set up an establishment. She said I was as rich as a Jew; that Child had told her so; she insinuated that husbands did not let their wives into the secrets of their wealth, or their amours; and that she would bring her out with eclat; and if I said a word about it, she and the ombre party would teach me better manners! My dear Eliza felt too indignant to take any further notice of this wicked counsel, than politely to reject the advice; saying—"Mr. Seaward and myself have arranged our plans; and I, therefore, must decline following the suggestions of any one. I believe while we remain in London, we shall continue at this hotel."—"No one will visit you here, my dear Mrs. Seaward," replied her visiter.—"If that be the case, Mrs. Child," rejoined my wife, "I perhaps may have reason to be glad that we have concluded not to take a house during our stay in town."—"Well to be sure," exclaimed the banker's wife, with a giggling laugh, "that is the funniest as well as the most ridiculous thing I ever heard said in my life! I heard something like it on the stage the other night;—you surely picked it up there." My Eliza made no answer. Mrs. Child continued the giggle; then rising suddenly to depart—"Well! bon jour, charmante!" she exclaimed; adding, "I hope soon to have the pleasure to see you again, chère amie." These attempts of Mrs. Child, although perhaps the offspring of folly rather than wickedness, were extremely disagreeable; so that we agreed to mix with her society as little as possible; and that I should strain every nerve to obtain the grant, that we might escape from the pestilence of London.

Sir Robert Walpole was at present out of town; the King was gone to Hanover; but the Queen-Regent was reported to be a kind-hearted lady, and might be more readily disposed than his Majesty, to accede to my request. Mr. Powis had proposed to speak to Mr. Paxton about it; but I at once rejected indirect influence. Mr. Powis had said—"A couple of hundred pounds would get me the right ear of the minister, and that every one knew he was deaf in the other ear; therefore, it was of the utmost consequence to obtain a comprehensible hearing." But I also had a right, and an unhearing ear, on some subjects; and Mr. Powis happened not to address me through my right ear.

However, early in September, the murder of Captain Porteus, by the Edinburgh people, brought the minister to London to hold a cabinet council; and very soon after this, Mr. Perry contrived to solicit an interview for me, and procured a card with my name written on it, bearing Sir Robert's initials in one corner. My dear wife and myself rejoiced, when he called on me with the news of his success so far. "Now, Mr. Seaward," said he, "I hate bribery and corruption in all shapes; and I have reason to believe you are of the same mind: but when you take this card, you must give a crown to the porter at the gate, another to the warder in the great hall, and half-a-guinea to the servant in waiting, who will show you into the secretary's room. And when you give him, I mean the secretary, the card, put a couple of guineas into his hand, wrapped up in a piece of clean paper, saying, "Sir, I will thank you to give this to those to whom I have given so much trouble." I soon got my lesson, and thanked Mr. Perry for the trouble he had taken in the business.

The next morning, I went to the minister's residence, at the hour appointed for my attendance; and passed the porter and the warder with silver keys, the servant in waiting with a small golden key; and next, having delivered my card to the secretary, and put two gold pieces, neatly wrapped up, into his hand, saying the precise words dictated by Mr. Perry, he made a gentle inclination of his head, and dropped the offering into one of his waistcoat-pockets, a pouch ample enough to contain a peck, Winchester measure. He took my card away, and, returning in a few minutes, desired me to wait. I was shown into a room where there were five gentlemen already in expectation of a summons. The anxious brow or inquiring eye was manifested in every face around me; but nothing passed beyond some remarks on the oppressiveness of the weather. In about an hour, I was requested to follow the servant in waiting; but had scarcely got beyond the ante-room, when a person with a star made his appearance, desiring to see Sir Robert. I was therefore under the painful necessity of returning to the other expectants for half an hour longer, during which time three more gentlemen came in; no doubt all with silver and gold keys, and little packets for the secretary's enormous and very fashionable pocket. I was at length again summoned; and being ushered into the minister's library, found him sitting before a large round table, in an old carved oak chair, with a pen in his hand, surrounded by written and printed papers; and the moment I entered he began to write.—“You must not speak, sir, till he is at leisure, and speaks to you,” whispered the attendant gently in my ear. In a few minutes, the great man laid down his pen, and without farther preface or ceremony, he addressed me, and the following dialogue ensued verbatim; for which I am not indebted to my memory, as will afterwards appear.

Sir Robert Walpole.—“I understand, sir, you want a grant of some island, or rocky islands, on the Spanish main: I wish to know upon what grounds you make this request?"

Mr. Seaward.—"I was shipwrecked, sir, nearly three years ago, on those rocky islands, when on my passage from Jamaica to the Bay of Honduras. We had been driven out of our course by a hurricane; the vessel struck in the night: the captain and crew took to the boat, and no doubt were lost. Next morning the brig drifted in over the reef, and I with my wife were the only persons saved. We landed on the largest island, and remained there alone, making the best arrangement I could for our future comfort. In about six months afterwards, two negro men and three women, who had escaped shipwreck from a Spanish schooner, were also cast upon the island. We then all laboured industriously, to propagate yams and maize, with some other seeds and roots I had taken on board the vessel, for my use at the Bay of Honduras. Some months after this, having seen vessels pass, we took the brig's fore-top-gallant-mast and ensign, and erected a flag-staff on the highest point of the land: very soon after it was done, I heard guns in the offing, and on ascending the height saw a Spanish armed brig chasing an English schooner, and firing at her with her bow-chases: I immediately hoisted the colours, and the schooner made for the inlet. We had three or four muskets, and some boarding-pikes, I had brought from the vessel, which we carried with us for our own defence, should it be necessary. But, sir, I could not stand by and see the Spaniard firing at an English schooner directly under our flag, without making a return upon his decks; on which he hauled his wind and stood off. The schooner, which was of Norfolk in Virginia, came then safely to an anchor, and the Spaniard came to, in the offing. In the night, however, he sent in his boat to take the schooner; but we met his boat with all the force we could collect, namely, six or eight of us altogether, armed with the muskets and boarding-pikes, and some axes and bill-hooks; and we succeeded in not only repelling him, but in taking from him ten muskets, with his ammunition, and two Bermudian negroes, his prisoners, that he had put in the boat as being good rowers. The officer gave up his sword; and I sent him and his crew back, thus disarmed, to their commander with a message, saying, that the conduct of the captain of the Guarda Costa was unpardonable, and it should be represented.—“I am afraid, sir,” continued Mr. Seaward, “I am tiring you with a long story; and, if you please, here it shall end.” Sir Robert replied—“Go on, sir.”—Mr. Seaward resumed—“After repairing some damages the schooner had sustained, I took a passage in her to Jamaica, and there purchased a Bermudian vessel, in which I carried to the rocky island a new main-mast, a suit of sails, a captain and a crew for the brig in which I had been stranded; and also some artificers and negroes, with stock and implements, to settle a little colony where Providence had placed me.* I applied to the governor of Jamaica, for a commission as captain-commandant of the islands; that I might be legally authorised to repel any attack of the Spaniards against us, and to give protection to any vessel taking shelter from them, among our rocks. And having obtained this credential, I took a twelve-pound gun to the island, which is now mounted on the height near the flag-staff; and I have trained the people to arms for defence, and have taken possession of the group of rocks and islands in the name of our most gracious Lord the King. I am, therefore, desirous to have a grant of all those rocks and islands, under the seal of his Majesty."

* Here, in this distinct reference to Providence, in bringing Seaward to the haven of the island, may be traced the name since found appended to it, in the recent account of the islands, as discovered by Lieut. Collett.—Note by the Editor, in this New Edition of 1841.

Sir Robert Walpole.—"This is a very serious business, sir; I have heard your version of it: the court of Spain may have occasion to represent it very differently. When the necessary inquiries have been made, my secretary shall have directions to require your attendance."

Mr. Seaward.—"Sir Robert Walpole, I should despise myself, and one I love dearer than my life would despise me, and the God I desire to serve would abhor me, if I could lie to you or to any man, or in one tittle deviate from the truth. If I had not loved and honoured my King, I need not have taken possession of those unpeopled rocks in his name. The Spaniard would have gladly acknowledged them and me! And in what way can I more substantially show my allegiance, than by offering to pay for a grant of that which is, in point of right, my own? Neither England, nor Spain, nor any other country, had ever thought it worth their while to take possession of those rocks; and, as I am not a courtier, I hope you will pardon my free declaration, that if I am to be pushed by, and put off with the answer you have now given me, I will immediately go to Madrid, and try how the matter will be received there. Recollect, Sir Robert, if the King is to have a right in those islands, it comes through my right: yet I wish to come to you for a grace; but when I have grace, to ask as a favour that which is a right, I do not see much grace in refusing a right, as if it were a favour."

Sir Robert Walpole.—"You are very warm, young man. If you were to go to Madrid, they would send you to the Castle for firing on their Guarda Costa, and in all probability you would be executed as an uncommissioned pirate. Call on me to-morrow morning at ten o'clock, and I will see what can be done."

I called on the minister the next morning, according to appointment, but instead of seeing him I got no further than the secretary. This gentleman was abundantly courteous, telling me I could not see Sir Robert; but that he would do every thing in his power to serve me and promote my views; he even overwhelmed me with compliment; said I ought to be made governor of Seaward Islands, with a handsome salary, but that the hands of the minister were absolutely tied; Pulteney and Wyndham, and some others, kept up such a continued alarm, that nothing could be done: however he could assure me that the minister was well disposed towards me; and if I could call in a few days, he would let me know when I might call again. But, he insinuated, that Sir Robert was rather displeased with my freedom of speech, and that he (the secretary) feared, unless we could make a friend of a person who has the ear of the minister, that he saw no end to my difficulties.—"Then, sir," said I, "you have no instructions to arrange this business with me?"—"O, bless you, sir," he replied, "businesses are not done in the kind of way you anticipate. At present, I can do no more than promise my good offices; and I have done so, relying on your good sense to make a grateful and proper use of them."—"I don't understand your way of doing business, sir," I rejoined; "and I have, therefore, only to beg you will accept my best acknowledgments, in the same spirit you have offered me your best services." The secretary stared at me; and each bowing very low to the other, I retired.

On returning home, I detailed to my dear wife all that had passed. She commended me for my true and upright spirit; saying—"If you can secure the islands to our people, by honest and direct means, even at the cost of a considerable sum of money, do it; but disdain, as you have done, any admission of bad conduct; or any overture of bribery to secretaries or go-betweens."—"Spoken like yourself, my best love!" I replied: "I desire nothing more than your commendation, in all I say and do; which never fails to secure to me my own approbation, and assures me of the approval of Him who tries all hearts."

On the following day, I had a visit from Mr. Powis. After the usual complimentary conversation, he said—"Well, I knew how it would be; you had an interview with Sir Robert, and it terminated just as I should have anticipated."—"And how do you know what turn it took, or how it terminated, Mr. Powis?" I replied.—"On your honour, Mr. Seaward, you will not disclose, while I live, any communication I may make to you; and I will tell you more than you could suppose. I do not deceive you by saying, that you won on my friendship the first day I had the pleasure of meeting with you at Mr. Child's; and I am, indeed, anxious to serve you. I told you, that the minister has two ears, which, perhaps, you think a very foolish observation. You did not speak to him through the right ear; although, I understand, you were very impressive; so much so, that he said—'I must know something more of this young man; I should not like him for an enemy.' But this sort of Puffendorff reasoning, my friend," continued he, "with a prime minister, won't do. Therefore, if you desire to gain your point, be advised by me; lower your tone, and get the right ear of the minister; which, by the by, he does not wear on his own head; only having there the left and t'other ear." Mr. Powis appeared to be so fond of this joke about the right ear, and seeming to lay so much stress on it, which being coupled by what the secretary had said about making a friend of a person "who had the ear of the minister," that I really began to believe there was an auricular pivot somewhere, on which only this business, and perhaps all others of a similar kind, could favourably turn.—"But," resumed Mr. Powis, "you have not promised to preserve inviolably, during my life, whatever I may impart to you."—"I faithfully promise," I replied.—"Do you remember," returned he, "what passed between Sir Robert Walpole and you at the interview?"—"I certainly do remember the substance of it," I replied.—"Is that anything like it?" he resumed, putting a sheet of paper into my hands. It was the dialogue itself. After reading it attentively.—"The very words," I replied: "you have astonished me, Mr. Powis; how is this? there was not any person in the room."—"You are right," said he; "there was not any person in the room, but Sir Robert and yourself; but there is a listening door, or rather a person within hearing behind a door, that takes down correctly the conversation held with every one admitted to an audience; and this is one of the minister's vouchers, for the uprightness and integrity of his conduct, which he always preserves in person. And I do believe he is an honest man, and means well," continued Mr. Powis; "but he is so beset, and finds so much difficulty in managing parliament, that he must preserve appearances, however ready he may be, under the rose, to grant through other channels anything for a hope of parliamentary services; and, indeed, he is so hard driven in this way, that he has been necessitated to establish a sort of fund, which is fed by such means as I have hinted at, for the purpose of securing votes from that quarter of the world 'from whence,' the Psalmist says, 'promotion cometh;' and the treasurer of this fund is the person who has his right ear. Do you understand me?" I thanked Mr. Powis with much sincerity for the disclosure he had made to me, and I gave him credit for the purity of his motives towards myself; but I did not feel that I could act upon the information he had given me; it would be a direct violation of my principles, and of the principles of one whose approbation I courted in all matters involving the question of moral right. He endeavoured to laugh me out of my resolution, but it would not do.—"Why is all this, my good friend?" said I; "there is no absolute favour asked. A grant of some barren rocks in the Caribbean Sea, is desired; and an equivalent ready to be paid. Lands were granted on the same principles, the other day, I may say, in the island of St. Christopher."—"You don't understand it," replied Mr. Powis: "there is always, in these cases, an abatement in the ostensible and visible price, which is to be accounted for to parliament, in consideration of a secret sum, or invisible influence, to support the minister in power." The problem was now solved; and he had nearly talked me over into the necessity of compliance, if I would carry my point, when my dear Eliza came in. He appealed to her, and went over his arguments again. She reflected a few minutes on what he had said, and then replied—"It is altogether morally wrong, Mr. Powis; the path is crooked; and to my mind, those considerations are quite sufficient to decide against all indirect overtures, whatever might be the result."—"Pardon me, madam," he replied, "if I say, it appears to me, you and Mr. Seaward are too fastidious, to accomplish any point of importance in life."—"There is no point, Mr. Powis," she replied, "of sufficient importance, to call for the sacrifice of singleness of intention; without which, all is perplexity, ending in remorse. And if Sir Robert Walpole cannot manage the parliament in any other way than you have explained, he is a foolish and a wicked man." Mr. Powis was not prepared for this honest eloquence, and here the subject dropped: but I felt I could not do less than ask him to dine with us in a friendly way, which he courteously accepted.

After dinner, the subject turned again upon obtaining the grant; and as the conversation I had had with the minister, served to let Mr. Powis into a good deal of our history, I took care to make him comprehend that I had no pecuniary interest in the success of my application; that it was set on foot solely for the security of the people located there; and, if I were pertinaciously refused my request, I would first turn the place and people over to the Crown of Spain, and then, as I had an ample fortune, and should have nothing else to do, I possibly might get a seat in parliament, and trouble the Right Hon. Baronet in a way not quite agreeable to him. "I am, Mr. Powis," continued I, "a Whig in principle; but I feel that all the honour I bring to my king, is reflected on myself; yet, loyal subjects and faithful servants must not be treated like dogs." Our friend was mute for some time: perhaps he had thought me rather an object of helplessness, than otherwise, and as such had stepped forward to serve me; and I thought his reply justified the conclusion; but I may be mistaken. "As this is the case, Mr. Seaward," said he, "I might leave you to fight your own battle; for it is odds you do not beat the minister." A smile of inward worth and strength, passed across my dear wife's countenance; and putting claret in her glass, "Come, Mr. Powis," said she, "we will drink the King's health, and all his true friends." Powis and I filled a bumper, as the monks would fill au bon père, and we drank the toast, like honest and true men. Mr. Powis was a good-hearted man, at least I thought so; and, as I said before, believed he had taken a fancy to me; so, notwithstanding the issue of his kindly intended visit, I was not surprised he took leave of us in perfect good humour.

On the 23d, I got the box of valuables from the clutches of the Custom-house officers, after paying the duties; and was glad to find the contents uninjured and correct. We now began to think seriously of giving up any further attempt to procure the grant, notwithstanding what Mr. Powis had said as to my chance of beating the minister; as I thought very differently from him on that point, and principle stood immovably in the way of the only now apparent practicable road. To-day, however, I had a call from Mr. Powis; who told me, as I liked straightforward business, he thought he could not please me better than by putting the declaration I had made at our last interview, in a train to reach Sir Robert Walpole, to try its effect; and he knew the minister had, in consequence, written a note to Mr. Perry, to inquire whether I were the man of property I represented myself to be; and that Perry had replied, "he knew nothing more of my property than that I had a very handsome balance in his hands, and held upwards of 60,000*l.* in three per cent. stock." I thanked Mr. Powis for his information, and told him that he and Mr. Perry both had acted perfectly right.

I waited anxiously for a week, venturing to hope that something might come out of this; but, being in the end disappointed, I began to suspect the accuracy of the statement Mr. Powis had made; and I therefore put the question to Mr. Perry, with respect to the minister's note, which he acknowledged to be correct, but added—"I cannot imagine how you can have come to the knowledge of the communication; for it was endorsed private, or I certainly would myself have told you." I replied, that I was quite satisfied with his conduct; and as the communication to me was also endorsed private, he must excuse my not disclosing it. He then turned the conversation to the subject itself, and said, he feared I was too inflexible in my principles to succeed with the minister; but deeply regretted the despicable policy of expediency that actuated all his measures, by which he surrounded himself with rotten sticks, and often lost the support of a staff of true British oak, for a consideration in itself not worth a straw. When this discourse drew to a close, I told him, if nothing occurred to prevent it, I should leave town next week, and act according to circumstances.

On Sunday, we visited Greenwich, and, after attending divine service at the chapel, had the gratification of seeing the beautifully painted hall, finished a few years ago by Sir Christopher Wren, now no more. It is all very fine, or rather imposing, excepting what I would call the altar-piece; in which two miserable portraits of his present Majesty and the Prince of Wales are introduced. Here, to my great surprise and joy, we met Captain James and his wife; with whom we had the pleasure of dining, and passed altogether an interesting and highly agreeable day.

On Monday the 4th of October, we began to pack up for quitting London, to revisit our dear friends at Awbury. While thus engaged, a lady called, and sent up her name, —Lady Sundon. My dear wife was soon ready to meet her; which she did with that courteous ease and dignity that ever flows from a noble and ingenuous nature; apologising, nevertheless, for being obliged to receive her in such a place, not as yet having any home in England, and being at this moment on the move from London. The stranger replied, that an apology was rather due from her, for venturing an intrusion; but she hoped the object of her visit would plead her excuse. After being seated, she said she had called by command of the Queen; who, having heard that Mrs. Seaward possessed some very rich gold tissue, superior to anything ever seen in Europe, Her Majesty had honoured her—Lady Sundon—with a command to purchase it at any price, if it were indeed what it was reported to be.—My dear wife smiled. “That cannot be, madam,” said she; “but I shall be most happy to present some pieces of gold tissue, or anything else I am possessed of, to her Majesty.”—“I fear,” replied the lady, “the Queen cannot accept of it from Mrs. Seaward.”—“Then,” rejoined my wife, “I shall have to regret, for once in my life, that I am only Mrs. Seaward.” After a pause, the stranger requested to be gratified with a sight of the gold web; and, in compliance with the wish, one of the richly wrought pieces (which the tirewoman had not seen) was shown to her. She was struck at once by its incomparable richness, and could not restrain her admiration; observing—“This, truly, is fit for a queen.” I now left my dear Eliza and the lady together. It seems they soon became sociable, for I found her still with my Eliza, after an hour’s absence. My well-judging wife had profited by the opportunity, to give her an outline of our shipwreck, and of our little settlement; and also told her, that our business in England was to purchase from the Crown a grant of the islands, so as to secure our people in the possession of their grounds and habitations; but as we could not succeed in obtaining it, we were going away, and would try to establish them as well as we could without it. She did not, in the course of this conversation, omit to mention how we had trained them to the observance of divine worship, and to reading on the Sabbath-day. Lady Sundon was a kind-hearted, and somewhat pious woman; so that she took great interest in the detail, and, on taking leave, promised to endeavour to persuade her Majesty to allow Mrs. Seaward to present the tissue for acceptance. "But, at any rate," added she, taking my wife's hand, "I hope you will not leave town immediately. I am desirous of cultivating your acquaintance, and I would say your friendship." My dear wife returned her a suitable compliment, and I had the honour of handing her Ladyship to the carriage, which bore the royal arms.

After the departure of this lady, my Eliza and myself turned the matter over, and hoped it might prove one of those mysterious interpositions of Providence, to accomplish that for us which we had failed in ability to do for ourselves, and, in consequence, were about to abandon as hopeless; we therefore determined to wait the issue of this adventure.

On Tuesday, my wife had a second visit from Lady Sundon, who imparted to her the pleasing intelligence, that the Queen would receive her at the palace on Thursday; and it had been arranged that her Ladyship, who now told us she was Mistress of the Robes and Lady in Waiting to her Majesty, should call in a royal carriage for Mrs. Seaward, and accompany her to the presence. I soon begged permission to retire; and having left them together, Lady Sundon very kindly entered into all the minutiae, with my wife, of the honour intended her. The dress she was to wear was then settled, and the etiquette to be observed was pointed out; but there was a point, on which her Ladyship had directions to be informed. "What is Mr. Seaward?—is he a merchant?"—"He was a merchant," replied my wife: "he is no longer one."

He gave up his business entirely to his brother, and is now in the possession of an ample fortune."—"I wish he had rank of any kind," replied Lady Sundon.—"The only rank he has, that I can mention," returned my wife, "is that of Captain Commandant of Seaward Islands; and I think I can show your Ladyship his commission, signed by the Governor of Jamaica." My Eliza soon laid her hands on the document, and showed it to her noble guest. "That will do," said she; "I am glad to know this; it may be of some importance to you, at least in your introduction to her Majesty, if nothing more."

The next day, I was surprised early in the morning by a visit from Mr. Powis. "You will have a message this morning," said he, "to attend the minister; be therefore in readiness. He says you are like Cassius: he must be wary of such like men."—"Let him know," returned I, "that I am not like Cassius;—but," continued I, "you are indeed very kind, Mr. Powis; you have acted towards me with a steady and persevering friendship, notwithstanding I have rejected your counsel."—"I esteem you the more, Mr. Seaward," said he, "for having done so, although it proves you have little experience in life." He had scarcely finished the sentence, when the note arrived from Sir Robert's secretary, desiring my attendance at ten o'clock. I hastened to dress in my plain suit, in which I had paid my former visit, and was punctual to the appointment.

Mr. Secretary was superabundantly courteous on the occasion; so that I was admitted at once into the library. The minister was not there; but came in presently, by a door that led from it into some other room or passage; perhaps this was the listening-door spoken of by Mr. Powis. "I am glad to see you, Mr. Seaward," said he: "draw a chair by me, and we will talk over this business of yours." Then taking up a chart of the West Indies, that lay on the table—"Show me where the rocks and islets are situated, for which you want the grant." I looked on the chart attentively a little while, then said—"They are not laid down here, Sir Robert; unless the Serranhas are intended to represent them. I then drew cross lines through the latitude of $14^{\circ} 30' N.$ and $81^{\circ} W.$ saying—"This is as near the spot as I can tell you. The latitude is correct, but the longitude has not been ascertained by observation." He then desired to know their extent; which I described to him with as much accuracy as I could. "Now," said he, "tell me honestly, what is your object in seeking to obtain this grant?" I told him. He shook his head. "I am not surprised, sir," said I, "that you do not credit me in such disinterested conduct; but I speak the truth; and I will bind myself not to appropriate rents or profits to myself in any way, from the grant, beyond freely bestowing its privileges on such persons as I may approve, under the penalty of forfeiture of the money I may pay to the Crown, and of the grant also."—"Well," returned he, "I perceive you understand the strong side of an argument—the argumentum ad res; and I will take you at your word. Now," continued he, "who is to estimate the value of this place?"—"Any one you please to name, sir," I replied, "if you will have the kindness to settle a principle on which the valuation is to be made." "You are no contemptible diplomatist, sir," said the minister. "Will you favour me," continued he, "with a principle?"—"I know of none, sir," I resumed, "that will apply; but, for want of a better, I would take the average price of the uncultivated lands of St. Christopher's, sold three years ago on account of the Crown."—"That will do, I think," replied he; but how shall we estimate the extent?"—"I can supply that, sir," said I, "as I have a rude survey of the rocks and islands, which can be measured; and I should wish my map, such as it is, to be copied, and appended to the patent."—"Mr. Seaward," answered the minister, "it shall be settled in your own way; I am happy to meet your wishes. I have satisfied myself that you are not a needy adventurer, and I am disposed to serve you. My secretary shall wait on you, with proper persons on the part of the Crown, within a few days; and the business shall be done." I thanked him for his kind condescension, and ventured to express a hope, that I might find an occasion, at some future period, to show the sincerity of my professions. Sir Robert bowed, and I took my leave.

On my way home, I ruminated on the great change I had witnessed in the manner and conduct of the minister towards me, but could not satisfy myself as to the cause. It can never be that he has been frightened into the measure, by Mr. Powis's report of my declaration. O no; it were presumption and folly to think so. Perhaps he is belied, in his desiring to make a market of this trumpery business, for the sake of getting a little money towards a fund for corrupt parliamentary purposes. He had a right to be on his guard against a stranger; and I think there is a sufficient explanation of his conduct, in what he said as to his having instituted an inquiry, and that he was now satisfied as to my being no needy adventurer. However, be this as it may, said I to myself, "if the thing be but done, and honestly done, it is of little consequence to me how it was brought about."

My beloved wife was rejoiced at my success, and not less gratified by the respectful civility I had received. She, too, endeavoured to account for the wonderful change which somehow or other had been wrought in Sir Robert; but was as much at a loss as myself to solve the riddle satisfactorily: I told her all I thought, to which we added many other surmises; but of one thing only we were certain—that I had not waded through dirty water to the object.

My dear Eliza now entered on the subject of her presentation, to take place to-morrow; and told me she had ordered a white satin dress, with a Spanish hat of the same, which was to be surmounted by two ostrich feathers, agreeable to Lady Sundon's arrangement. "Dear Eliza," said I, "you ought to wear pearls with this dress; and I shall be highly gratified in presenting them to you."—"So I thought," was her reply; "but as her Ladyship said nothing about them, I made up my mind to say nothing either, for they are expensive ornaments, and you have already laid out more money on my neck, than it is worth; therefore, I am content to go to Court in perfect simplicity of attire."—"Ah! my sweet pet," I replied, "thy neck is worth more than all the pearls of the Pacific, and all the diamonds of Brazil! we will go together to the jeweller's; and I shall be happy, indeed, in contributing so small an addition to your innate value." Before dinner-time we made our purchases; necklace, earrings, and a pearl loop, with a diamond star for the hat, and a pretty little brilliant ring besides, which I quietly put on her finger: for the amount of which, with unfeigned pleasure, I gave an order on my banker for 130 guineas.

On Thursday at noon, the royal carriage called with the Lady Sundon. My lovely wife was dressed, and ready to receive her. "Dear Mrs. Seaward," she exclaimed, "you look like an angel just dropped from heaven."—My Eliza blushed, and taking her by the hand, said—"Then I must apply to my husband, and to you, the words of Mr. Pope, to Orpheus and St. Cecilia." Her Ladyship paused, not immediately recollecting the allusion: seeing it was so, my beloved, and peerless one, repeated the lines, turning first to me, and then to her—

" He raised a mortal to the skies,
She drew an angel down."

Something beyond the ordinary tone of feeling followed this, in which our noble visiter bore a part; and she finished the scene in perfect keeping (as painters express themselves), by quoting from our new but admirable poet, Thomson—

" Oh, happy they, the happiest of their kind, Whom gentler stars unite!"

" I will tell the Queen all this," continued she; " I am sure her Majesty will be quite delighted."

The two pieces of embossed gold tissue had been wrapped in a piece of white satin; the original curious paper wrappers being previously folded round each piece. The parcel was placed in the carriage; and my dear wife then taking leave of me, by kissing my forehead as I bent my head towards her, whispered—" Do not be uneasy about me; I feel quite collected, and assured under the protection of this kind lady." Lady Sundon made her precede her to the carriage, and I had the honour to hand them in.

After their departure, I received a visit from Mr. Powis. He met the carriage just as it turned up into the Strand, and had recognised Mrs. Seaward.—" Well, my good friend," said he, " I am come to congratulate you on your success with the minister; but do tell me how you think it has been brought about?"—" I cannot tell you, my kind friend," I replied; " you know quite as much about it as I do; therefore, if you cannot explain it, I have not a ground to surmise on."—" It is very strange," cried he;

“no ear-tickling—no palm-tickling; if he was not talked into it by what you said to him, or alarmed into it by what you said to others, backed by the result of his inquiries to Perry, I cannot account for it. His secretary cannot account for it; the thing is altogether out of common course: but,” continued he, “I saw Mrs. Seaward in one of the royal carriages; there may be something in that I don’t know.”—“If there be anything in that,” I replied, “perhaps Sir Robert having so much to do with Highland chiefs, some of them, or their seers, through the second sight, may have apprised him of what would happen, so that he has been beforehand with royal favour.”—“Upon my life, Seaward,” said Mr. Powis, smiling, “you are too bold: what would Sir Robert say, if he were to hear of this repartee at his expense?”—“I should be heartily glad of it,” I replied; “nothing would make me more proud, than that he should come to the conclusion, that I am very unlike most men of the present day.” My friend Powis seemed a little staggered what to make of me; and, indeed, so was I with regard to him. He began to think he had yet to make me out; and I began to think I had made him out. I don’t know whether he took me for the Czar, risen from the dead, and in disguise; but I began to suspect him of being the right ear of the minister, or the whispering gallery appended to it; and, therefore, I put on my old armour of caution. He endeavoured again to agitate the question, as to the cause of my success; and tried many indirect questions, to elicit from me where Mrs. Seaward was going, and who it was that he saw with her in the royal carriage. I told him I did not deem myself at liberty to speak of Mrs. Seaward’s movements, to my most intimate friends; there was a delicacy connected with every action of a woman that forbade it: he felt the rebuke, and here the subject ended.

After some trivial conversation, Mr. Powis left me; but I must confess I was not easy after he was gone, lest I had wronged him in my mind; for he certainly seemed ever earnest in his desire to serve me, and had taken much pains to do so, as far as giving me information went; and it might be, that considering himself a connoisseur in matters of ministerial favour, and now taken by surprise at what had occurred to me, he was anxious to solve a problem, to his mind out of all rule.

Reflections on Mr. Powis soon gave way to a subject nearer and dearer to my heart; how it fared with my gentle Eliza, in her new and trying situation: but I had confidence in her good sense, her fine discrimination of propriety in all situations, her native dignity, yet suavity of manner, and, not least, in her youth and beauty: for, in truth, if the words of John Milton were ever applicable to any human being, they were to her, when she and Lady Sundon left me:—

“ Grace was in all her steps, Heaven in her eye,
In all her gestures dignity and love.”

At three o'clock my beloved returned. I received her with open arms. “Dear Edward,” she exclaimed, “we are met again!”—“But tell me about the Queen, dearest,” said I, “and how you got through your part of the interview.”—“O, quite well,” she replied; “but it was all ceremony. On our arrival at the palace, we were received by a gentleman in waiting, who escorted us to the ante-room. The parcel was brought up by some one, and placed on a marble table with gilt legs, which stood between two of the windows. In a few minutes, another lady in waiting came to us; when Lady Sundon introduced me to her as the wife of Captain Seaward; this second lady took my hand; and while my friend (as I think I may call her) walked by my side, I was led into a room, where her Majesty was seated:—"Courage!" the lady whispered in my ear; and almost immediately after, letting my hand drop, courtesied gracefully to the Queen, saying, 'I have the honour to present the wife of Captain Seaward to your Majesty.'—"You are welcome, Mrs. Seaward," said the Queen; 'I am happy in seeing you here.'—"I am too happy," I replied, 'in finding myself in the presence of our illustrious Queen: I shall be happy in the recollection of this day, until the latest period of my life.' I had scarcely finished the sentence, when Lady Sundon put the parcel into my arms; and, agreeable to previous arrangement, I then approached quite near to her Majesty, and, dropping on one knee, laid the parcel at her feet, saying—"If your Majesty will be graciously pleased to accept this small tribute of affectionate loyalty, from the hands of your most devoted servant, your condescension will leave the deepest impression of gratitude on her heart."—"Well done, Eliza!" I exclaimed; "Lady Sundon could not have played the courtier better herself."—"Dear Edward," replied my wife, "it was a set speech, dictated by her Ladyship for the occasion: but I certainly did feel what the words said."—"Well, my love," said I, "tell me all the rest; I have been very rude to interrupt you, and have shown clearly enough that I never have been at Court." My dear wife then resumed her account of the presentation:—"Her Majesty merely replied, 'I have much pleasure in accepting anything from your hands, as a proof of my esteem for a good wife in trying circumstances.' My friend Lady Sundon now took my hand and raised me, for I was a little affected by the compliment; then courtesying together before the Queen, her Majesty made a sign that we might retire: so we obeyed;

but keeping our face towards the royal person, until we got out of the presence, into the ante-room. Here my kind friend immediately kissed me, saying—"Dear Mrs. Seaward, you have acquitted yourself nobly: the carriage is in waiting for you; hurry home to your husband, who will be made happy by the account you have to give him." I took leave of Lady Sundon, in a manner her cordiality deserved; and at parting she promised to call on me in a day or two. A gentleman in waiting handed me to the carriage; and now, here I am, my dear Edward, with the sovereign of my heart."

The week passed away without seeing her Ladyship, or hearing anything from Sir Robert's secretary relative to the grant. But it was soon known amongst our acquaintance, that my wife had been introduced to the Queen; and she was in consequence pestered with visits from Mrs. Child and her friends, now doubling pressing in their invitations, and not very delicate in their inquiries. But, strange as it may appear, the object of my wife's presentation was never known beyond the circle then present, all of whom were freemasons in petticoats. And, indeed, I have reason to believe that not even Sir Robert Walpole himself, nor the prying Mr. Powis, could ever ascertain the precise matter, whatever suspicions might be entertained on the subject.

My dear wife could not but complain of the troublesome daily visits of Mrs. Child; on account of which I advised her to give the lady a rub that she richly deserved. "Say to her," said I, "that you are astonished to see people of fashion paying visits to a person in a hotel."—"That would not be like us, my dear Edward!" she replied: "I might have done so a little time ago; but now, that a woman of quality has visited me here, it would carry an air of insolence in it, which, on reflection,

I am sure you would not approve." I was convinced. "You are right, my love!" said I; and the subject being thus disposed of, we put on our things, and strolled out to refresh ourselves by a walk in St. James's Park.

On Sunday, the 12th, we attended divine service at St. Paul's; and were much delighted, both by the organ and by the chanting; and much edified in hearing an impressive sermon from one of the prebendaries. On our return from the Cathedral, my dear wife received a kind note from Lady Sundon; importing that she had been indisposed, but was now better, and would call at the Adelphi, on Tuesday.

On Monday, one of the minister's secretaries made his appearance at my hotel, with two gentlemen on behalf of the Crown, to settle the conditions of the grant. After the usual ceremonies of introduction, we entered on the business; and I produced my chart. The deputy surveyor-general, who was one of them, said it appeared to be accurate; bearing internal evidence of having been done by a person who knew what he was about. To a question he put, I answered, "It was done by the captain of a schooner, I kept to go occasionally to Jamaica." As there was a scale to the chart, the royal surveyor very soon measured and calculated the area of the islands. He made the peninsular promontory to contain two square miles; George's Island, beyond the isthmus, nine square miles; Edward's Island, six square miles; in all 7880 acres. This point being settled, I stated the principle agreed on by the minister and myself, as to the valuation. The gentlemen said, they were aware of it: and that 5s. per acre was the average price of the lands granted at St. Christopher's. The calculation on these data being soon made, it was found that the purchase-money would amount to 1970%. An observation then fell from one of the gentlemen as to the detached rocks, and the long sandy isthmus, not having been taken into account: "Well," said I, "let us put down the odd 30*l.* in consideration of these, and all others in, near, or belonging to the said islands." After a little demur, my proposition was agreed to. "Now, gentlemen," resumed I, "the business is settled; requiring only to be carried into effect."—"Just so, sir," said the secretary.—"Well, then," I rejoined, "when the deed is made out, and has received the royal signature, I shall be happy to pay the money, and such fees and charges as may be usual in such cases." The deputy surveyor-general requested the loan of my chart, to have two copies of it taken: one to append to the deed; the other, to lodge in the office: and the business being now quite arranged, they took their leave.

On the following day, my wife received a visit from Lady Sundon; and the meeting was cordial. My Eliza said to her noble guest—"If I had not feared it might have been an intrusion, I would have come to see your Ladyship when you were sick."—"Come now," replied Lady Sundon; "if Mr. Seaward will spare you one day to me, I should be most happy!" My dear wife looked at me.—"Will you spare me, Edward?"—"Certainly," said I, "to that lady; who, I perceive, is really attached to you."—"Indeed I am," exclaimed her Ladyship, taking my wife's hand in the most kind manner. "You will not think strange of this hesitation on my part," said my Eliza to her friend, "when I tell you that we have not been separated a whole day, at any one time, since I became Mrs. Seaward! And indeed," continued she, "I am so happy, where every woman ought to seek her happiness, that I have no desire, except in such a case as this, to be absent for a moment." I took my Eliza's hand, and put it to my lips. She then begged permission to go and dress, which she would soon do; and left me with her Ladyship. The first words of this excellent woman were like sweet music to my ear.—“She is a divine creature!” said Lady Sundon; “so unlike all the women I see of the present day! and I assure you the Queen is quite charmed by her beauty, and her manner, and her propriety: and I rather think she will see her Majesty before we return; but not being certain of it, I do not like to say so to her, lest my sweet friend should be disappointed.” Her ladyship then asked me if I had accomplished my business as to the grant with the Crown officers. I told her it was definitively arranged yesterday, and would soon be made out, and I hoped immediately presented to her Majesty, as Regent, to sign it. “Now, Captain Seaward,” resumed the lady, “I will tell you a secret: the Queen has not been very well pleased with a certain person, for the course he intended to pursue with respect to your affair; she spoke to him on the subject, and soon became peremptory; and it is only in consequence of this, that the business has been done. You therefore now know to whom you are obliged: and do take care,” continued she, “not to throw away your money on persons who may endeavour to persuade you the obligation is in any other quarter. The Queen knows all that passed between the minister and yourself, and between you and other persons, on the subject, and expressed her admiration of your spirit, and of the sentiments you avowed on the occasion. He was a good deal piqued,” added Lady Sundon, “when her Majesty gave him her commands; and he ventured to say, with a smiling bitterness, ‘Perhaps your Majesty would approve of our sending him as envoy to Madrid,’—to which she drily replied, ‘Cassius is not to our liking, Sir Robert:’ then receiving his leave to retire, he bowed, and withdrew; evidently a good deal nettled. "I believe, however," continued her Ladyship, "you have nothing to fear from him; he has nothing to gain by annoying you, but may risk the royal displeasure: and I am quite sure you may count on her Majesty's protection and his compliance." My wife now joined us; and after thanking her Ladyship for her great kindness, I handed them to the carriage, and saw them off.

Fidele—our dear little Fidele! was the representative of his mistress to-day; I therefore talked to him sometimes, by way of consoling both him and myself, in her absence. "Well, poor fellow," said I, "you were once our chief delight and care; now you receive only a transient kind word, or a look; but we do not esteem you the less, Fidele; come here, poor dog!" He raised his forefeet on my knee, and licked my hand; and said all that a dog could say, in return. He spoke not with the tongue, that may lie; but with the eye and demeanour, that generally speak truth. Being first favourite to-day, I helped him to the wing of a chicken. "You like that better than pepper-pot, old fellow!" said I: he looked very knowing as he took it from my hand; which I interpreted, "Indeed, I believe I do." Thus I played the fool, as fools would call it; giving a truce to all anxieties respecting the completion of my grant, or the favour of the Queen.

In the afternoon, I took a walk to Palace Yard, to amuse myself: looking about me with interest or admiration on many of the buildings in that quarter; but especially on the Abbey of Westminster. Then, wishing to prolong my stroll, I turned towards the river, where a great many people were at work on the foundation of the new bridge. I here met Mr. Powis, with two other gentlemen, one of whom had accompanied the minister's secretary, to arrange with me about the grant. Mr. Powis expressed himself most happy to meet me; and after some conversation, he proposed to go to the Bell and Sun, in King Street, to take a bowl of punch. I objected to this, saying, "I should not like to be seen in a tavern."—"Bless you," cried he, "Sir Robert Walpole, and some of his friends from the country, dine at that tavern almost every day while Parliament sits, previous to their going down to the House of Commons."—"As that is the case," I replied, "I suppose we need not be ashamed to be seen there." So accordingly we went, and drank a couple of bowls of punch. We had scarcely sat down, when the conversation turned on the topics of the day; during which a variety of political subjects were discussed. I took no part in it: but the debate soon ran high between the two gentlemen I knew, and the stranger. I readily perceived he was no friend to the minister, for he would not accede to anything they said, either in commendation of Sir Robert, or his politics. In the course of this altercation, the stranger gave vent to the following philippic. "Sir Robert Walpole says he is a Whig: it may be so; but I never could discover it in his politics, as far as I am acquainted with them. If I did not know that Pulteney, and most of his set, are Tories; judging by their sentiments, I should set them down as Whigs—and Whigs, too, of the first order. But all distinction is confounded by the different light in which situation places the leaders of party; so that, I presume, we must consider public men to be in some respects like the chameleon, who changes his colour according to the ground he stands on: yet, I do not mean to say, that, like him, they are content merely to bask in the royal sunshine, and live upon flies." When the second bowl of punch was finished, the anti-ministerial man desired to call for another, and offered to pay for it himself; but the question being put to the vote, he was left in the minority, as might be anticipated: so his mouth was shut; and having paid the reckoning, we forthwith quitted the house, directing our steps to Charing Cross; where I took my leave of my companions, rejoicing within myself that I bore no part in the conversation, and that my own affairs had not in any way been brought forward.

About eight o'clock, my dear wife returned to me, highly gratified by her visit to the palace. She had dined with Lady Sundon, and her venerable aunt, who had been maid of honour to Queen Anne. The old lady was delighted with her niece's friend; and my Eliza, who always took a peculiar pleasure in being kind and respectful to persons advanced in life, was particularly attentive to her. In the afternoon, her Majesty had desired to see Mrs. Seaward in a private manner, with Lady Sundon. When she went, the Queen received her affably, laying aside the sovereign for the time; and, with expressions of great interest, listened to all the particulars of our shipwreck, and subsequent adventures, and improvements on the island. She laughed heartily at my wife's account of the Battle of the Peccaries: but a higher feeling manifested itself, when the narrator described my attack on the Spanish Guarda Costa; and the result of the attempt made by him in his boat. And here, no doubt, my dear wife put forth her best eloquence;—for her feelings were always quite alive to every circumstance of that rencontre—"My brave and generous husband," was a favourite expression with her when speaking on this subject. "Nobly done!" exclaimed her Majesty; "he shall have the reward of the brave." As the day began to draw to a close, her Majesty said—"You must come another day, and tell me more; it is altogether a very interesting story:" then taking her by the hand, the Queen added—"I am delighted with your present; it will make me the richest dress in Europe; and I desire you will accept this from me;"—taking a diamond cross from a little case, and fixing it with her own hands to the pearl necklace my wife wore on her neck. There was great dignity as well as delicacy in this act of the Queen. The obligation under which a valuable present might be supposed to place her, was now removed by an equivalent in value; so that every future kindness from her Majesty became a free measure of grace and condescension.

My dear Eliza was deeply affected by this signal graciousness in a queen of England to her, and could not help feeling proud of the attentions she had altogether received at the palace.—"But," said she to me, after giving way a little to feelings that might readily be excused, "it is God that disposes all hearts! and I must humble myself before Him, lest mine should fall into the snare of vain-glorying in anything earthly. I could not endure the thought, that he might withdraw His face from us, my dear Edward." She had detected the condition of her own heart; and desired me to join her to-night in humbling ourselves before the Majesty of Heaven; which I did; and we found that peace in prayer, which our Father and our God never denies to those who seek it with a true and faithful spirit.

Early the next morning, we had a visit from Lady Sundon. After a few minutes' agreeable conversation with my wife, which chiefly turned on the great affability of her Majesty, and the interest she took in our welfare, Lady Sundon told my Eliza, that the Queen would fix an early day to see her again; and that her Majesty requested her to bring the little dog which had fought by her side against the wild beasts. Lady Sundon then turned to me, smiling, and said—"But my visit is to you, Mr. Seaward. I come to save you some unnecessary uneasiness. The Queen will throw aside the grant, when it is brought to her with other papers, to sign. Mr. Powis, most likely, will come and tell you this; and, as of course you would feel surprised and uneasy, if you did not know how it had happened; I am authorized to tell you, that in a few days after, it will be signed by her Majesty, under some particular alteration she intends." I thanked her Ladyship; and said—"I should be most happy to acquiesce in any alteration her Majesty might think fit to make." Lady Sundon smiled sweetly. "I fear, my Lady," resumed I, "you will scarcely be able to pardon the liberty I am about to take; but I throw myself on your kindness; may I ask, who is Mr. Powis?" She smiled again, but not as she had smiled a minute ago: in the former smile, a ray of delight seemed to dance in her eye; a sort of quivering now played about her mouth, curling up the angle of the lip. "I believe he is one of Sir Robert's jackals," she replied; "but to do him justice, he is not a mercenary. It is his passion to find out every thing, and to tell every thing: in doing which, he has done incalculable mischiefs; but he entertains the vain hope of serving all parties. Vanity seems to be the main-spring of his actions; he is desirous to be thought somebody; and is never so well pleased, as when he can do a little job for Mr. Paxton, the secretary to the Treasury, and bring some grist to their private mill."—"I thank you, my dear madam," I replied; "sometimes I suspected so: but really could not make him out; his friendship for me appeared so perfectly disinterested."—"He is not a bad character," she resumed; "but he is true to the game he has engaged himself to play; I say engaged himself, for he is a volunteer in the business. I suppose he talked to you about getting hold of the right ear of the minister! A paper appeared in Fog's Journal some months ago, 'On Ear-tickling, as practised by the Chinese;'—it is whispered he wrote it: but we know better: it is rather a satire on Sir Robert, and was not written by such a man as Powis."—"Well, how incredible!" exclaimed my dear wife; "I could not have suspected such double dealing, in any man."—"Ah! dear Mrs. Seaward," replied our noble visiter, "any base coin of brass, impressed with the image of Virtue, is allowed to circulate for gold; and passes current here, without much scrutiny."

The conversation having thus finished, her Ladyship left us: and we talked over what we had heard, wondering as to the alteration the Queen intended to make in the grant, and what the matter meant altogether. It ended, however, in our feeling satisfied that her Majesty intended us no injury; and, therefore, we dismissed its consideration from our minds, and were at rest on the subject.

On Friday, the 15th, I had a visit from Mr. Powis, who came in with a very long face; and, after as long a preamble, told me, I had been deceived in the quarter on which I had grounded my expectations; that after all the trouble Sir Robert had taken, the Queen-Regent had refused to sign the grant, and had thrown the paper aside. I made no reply. "Now, my dear friend," continued he, "if you had been guided by me, this could not have happened." "Indeed, I believe so, Mr. Powis," I replied.—"Well, then," he resumed, "be wiser in future, and I will put you in the way of rectifying your error."—"I thank you, my good friend," said I; "but every man, I suppose, has a rule or principle of his own to guide him through life; and mine says, 'Keep the straight path in all your doings, and leave the result to the Disposer of all things.'"—"That is," returned he, "the minister! and if you continue in any other trust, you will by and by be unable to get to him by any path at all."—"Thank you, Mr. Powis," said I again, "for your good advice. But I am not born to shine in Protean wisdom; I will leave the matter where it is." I am sure I could read on his brow—"What an ass that fellow is!" But whether the obstinacy or patience of the animal were meant, I could not in my own mind determine. My dear wife sat by, the while, not a little amused with the conversation. Mr. Powis appealed to her. "Ladies know nothing of these matters," she replied. And after a little more vain rhetoric from the confidant of the minister's confidant, he took his leave.

On Tuesday, the 19th, a note came from the palace, saying the Queen desired to see Mrs. Seaward to-morrow morning, attended by the little dog; and wished Captain Seaward to be informed, there would be a levee at St. James's on Friday, and that her Majesty desired him to attend in his uniform, and that Lord Harrington had promised to present him. The note was from Lady Sundon, addressed to my wife; to which a suitable reply was returned, and our wits were now set to work as to what was to be done. Fidele must be washed with scented soap, combed, and not allowed to eat any animal food. My old blue and gold were got out, and put under survey; we thought they might do: they were very good; and, having been worn, we decided that this added somewhat to their respectability. A new hat, however, was to be purchased; and as my knee and shoe-buckles were of silver, they would not suit the present occasion, therefore gold ones must be bought, and I determined on having one of the Spanish gold sword-handles, with its lion's head, properly fitted up with blade and scabbard, and slung with one or more of the massy gold chains selected from among the articles in the plate chest. No time was lost in putting these matters in forwardness; and I applied to the jeweller from whom I had bought my wife's pearls and diamonds, to get the sword mounted in the best mode, telling him the hilt was pure gold. He weighed it before me, and said he would do so again before the workman, to whom he was to intrust the job; and have it so fitted, that he could take off the hilt, and weigh it again when it came back. I approved his caution; and then bought the gold buckles for my shoes and knees. We had encountered heavy expenses in this way of late; but they were not to occur again, and therefore could not injure my fortune; for such expenditures are not like the life-drain of daily high outgoings, occasioned by an overwhelming establishment.

A royal carriage was sent for my wife on the next morning; she was quite ready. "You are to go too, Fidele," said she: the dear little dog was quite overjoyed at the well-known words of his mistress; and having been washed with violet soap, was quite in trim, "to come before a queen." I caught the little fellow up in my arms, that he might not encounter the dirt on the pavement; and taking the hand of his mistress, led her down, and placed them side by side comfortably in the carriage.

In my Eliza's absence, I brushed up the gold lace on my blue suit; then walked out to buy my hat, and went to hurry the business of my sword: endeavouring to pass away the day as well as I could.

In the evening I had the happiness to see my sweet angel return, and greeted her with a joyous welcome.

She told me of all the kindness she had received from the Queen, to whom she had related so much more of our history as she thought might be interesting. Her Majesty took great notice of Fidele, and had the curiosity to look at the scar in his throat, made by the tusk of the peccary. "You should have a pension, brave little fellow," she said. Her Majesty then put several questions to my wife, bearing on the various incidents she had just related; and in her answers the Queen expressed her hope, "that if we did not find the people grateful, for whose sakes we had taken so much pains, we might nevertheless find them happy; and that, perhaps, was all that any benefactor of mankind ought reasonably to desire." At length my Eliza had permission to retire; her Majesty saying to her at the same time, "Your husband attends the levee on Friday? Lord Harrington will send his carriage for him, and introduce him; and it may be well for you to accompany him, and remain with your friend, Lady Sundon, until it is over."—"Your Majesty is all graciousness!" replied my dear wife, as she took her leave.

On Thursday, there was a great fuss about my ruffles and stock; and it was judged right to have gold lace round the knee-bands of the breeches, and elsewhere, besides a richly embroidered waistcoat; and, in addition, a fine pair of white silk hose, with elegant shoes of Spanish leather, turned up at the toes. At night, the sword came home, and looked quite magnificent: so that now all was in readiness for the trying occasion of the morrow.

I put on my habiliments by good time in the morning, all excepting my wig, which I feared to discompose; it being finely dressed, looking not unlike a gooseberry bush in a hoar frost. I also girded on my sword; and walked about, then stood, and then sat, with it hanging by my side, so as to accustom myself to it a little; lest I should be awkward in the royal presence, and, perhaps, get it between my legs, and tumble down. As the time of my departure drew nigh, I felt my courage fail me; and the first time in my life, had a qualm of the coward's sickness. My dear wife cheered me, but the palms of my hands continued cold and clammy. At length, the carriage was announced. My beloved soul gave me a life-imparting kiss; and helping me to adjust my peruke, we went hand in hand, with my hat under my arm, to the carriage, entered it, and drove off. I felt my blood beginning to circulate again pretty freely as we passed Charing Cross; and was quite myself, or perhaps a little flushed, when we alighted at the palace. Lady Sundon took my wife from my hand at a turn of the grand staircase; when, at the same time, I was introduced to Lord Harrington, who led the way for me to the ante-room. He talked to me about the West Indies and Spanish America; and, with great courtesy, said, he was happy in having been requested to present me. I thanked him for his great kindness in sending his carriage for me, and for the honour he intended me. He then took me aside, and asked me if I knew the purpose of the Queen, in desiring my attendance at the levee. I replied, it was an honour I had no right to expect; but her Majesty had been graciously pleased to command my attendance, and it would afford me great pleasure to express my gratitude. "There is something more than that," said his Lordship, "or I am mistaken: however, I think it right to tell you, if her Majesty should hold out her hand when you are presented, drop down on your right knee, and gently approach her hand with your lips; but do not move from your kneeling position, until she retires a few steps from you; and if she should desire you to do anything, do it, whatever it may be." Having said this, he took me by the arm, adding—"Now we must go in." There were many of the nobility present, and several officers, naval and military, all of whom formed a sort of half circle; her Majesty being seated when we entered the levee room. After a little, her Majesty arose, and I had the advantage of seeing several officers and others presented; to every one of whom she said a few words. Sir Robert Walpole was there; who, in a short time, recognised his humble servant. He came round, and said something to the noble Baron, my introducer, who answered only by a smile. The minister, however, gave me a gracious nod, and went back to his place. It now came to my turn. His Lordship took me by the hand, and, as we advanced from the circle, the Queen looked steadily at me. She seemed in that moment to be making up her mind, on a person about whom she had lately heard so much. "I have the honour," said Lord Harrington, "to present to your Majesty, Captain Edward Seaward; who, under a commission from the Governor of Jamaica, commands a small dependency on the Spanish Main."—"You are not unknown to us, sir," said the Queen; "I am happy in an opportunity of evincing my satisfaction in what you have done for the service and honour of his Majesty." She held out her hand, and I did as the noble Baron had directed me. In an instant, I saw a sword in the hand of my august Mistress: from whom she had taken it, I had not seen; but she laid the blade upon my shoulder, with the gentlest grace imaginable, and said—"Rise up, Sir Edward Seaward." There were two persons thunderstruck; Sir Robert Walpole and myself. I was too much absorbed in my own affair, to see him; but Lord Harrington told me afterwards, that when her Majesty finished her address to me on being presented, Sir Robert looked round him with evident confusion, to the no small pleasure of some persons present. However, like a true courtier, he lost no time in coming up to me; and giving me his hand, said—"Sir Edward Seaward, I congratulate you on the favour of her Majesty."

The levee being concluded, the noble Baron told me his carriage should wait to take me back to my hotel; but he believed I might not yet return; for he knew from Lady Sundon, that it was the Queen's intention to see Lady Seaward, in her private apartment, after the levee. I am not ashamed to confess, that my heart was expanded by a delightful feeling, when the words "Lady Seaward" fell from the lips of the noble Lord; yet I hope it arose purely from the pride I always felt in seeing my dear Eliza honoured, and not from any indirect self-elevation, which perhaps the distinction I had just received might be calculated to inspire. Lord Harrington then accompanied me to Lady Sundon's apartments, and introduced me to her venerable aunt; to whom he spoke a few agreeable things, and then wished me good morning. I sat and talked with the old lady about half an hour: she congratulated me on the Queen's favour; and made me still more happy by praising my wife,—saying, I did not know how much they all loved her.

At last, my sweet angel appeared, leaning on the arm of her friend; who had been desired by the Queen to bring her into the royal private apartment, immediately after the levee, that her Majesty might have the pleasure of imparting to her the knowledge of what had just been done. As they entered the room where the Queen was, her Majesty advanced towards them, and taking my Eliza by the hand, said, with a beneficent smile—"Lady Seaward, I am happy to see you." My beloved looked up earnestly, with an enquiring eye, but did not speak. "I have added one more brave knight to our list, a few minutes ago, in the person of your husband; and I have reserved to myself the pleasure of communicating the intelligence to you." My tender-hearted Eliza was overcome;—being ever alive to the most grateful feelings, even for the smallest kindnesses, she was now overpowered, and sunk at the feet of her Majesty; but collecting herself in a moment, exclaimed—"My honoured husband! Your Majesty has indeed made me happy, by exalting him." The Queen raised her as she wept; but they were tears of gratitude rather than of joy. Her Majesty's kind nature was conspicuous throughout; she made her sit down beside her, desiring Lady Sundon, at the same time, to give her a little water, which she offered to my Eliza with her own hand; and would not suffer her to depart until her composure was quite restored. At length the Queen pressed her hand with great kindness, and gave her permission to withdraw.

My Eliza, on some occasions, would not be restrained by forms. The moment she came into the room where I was, she flew into my arms; and giving full vent to her feelings, wept unrestrained. The two ladies present understood human nature too well to interfere. In a short time, she smiled and kissed me, saying—"Now I am better.—My dear and kind friends, pardon this weakness, and my rudeness."—"Thou child of nature!" replied Lady Sundon; "would to Heaven that all women were like thee!" We did not refuse a glass of Mountain and a bit of cake, which were kindly offered to us; and soon after, we returned to the hotel in Lord Harrington's carriage. On alighting, I felt it incumbent on me to behave handsomely to his Lordship's servants, and I desired them to wait. When I had handed my dear wife up stairs, I sent a guinea each to the two footmen, and a couple of guineas to the coachman. He who took the vail to the servants, brought back the news into the hotel, of what had taken place at the levee; and we were not many minutes without receiving the humble congratulations of our hostess; and my dear wife was Ladyship'd before night by every servant that she had occasion to speak to, until she was quite sick of it.

We now made sure of the grant, and saw into the Queen's reason for putting it aside; no doubt, having had it in contemplation to honour us as she had done; and that, therefore, it would come, to be made out for Sir Edward, instead of Captain Seaward. To make some grateful acknowledgment to our friend Lady Sundon, and to devise some offering of gratitude to her Majesty also, occupied our earliest thoughts. After some deliberation, my wife suggested the probable acceptability of the silver perfume boxes;—they were large and massy, and richly embossed with Scripture story; the one representing the Nativity, the other the going down into Egypt: a cow and calf, near the manger where the infant Jesus lay, were well executed; and the ass, in the going down into Egypt, was a remarkably true copy of nature. It was resolved to have the former richly gilt, in dead and burnished gold, for her Majesty; and to have the other go through the hands of the silversmith, so as to give it a dead silvery white, on a smoothly refreshed surface, as the subject might require.

The next morning, we went to the jeweller, who was a silversmith also, and gave him the necessary directions respecting the cases, and their internal boxes likewise, which were to be made to correspond with the exterior. During the day, the Lord Harrington sent his compliments, and Sir Robert Walpole sent his compliments; and our dear friend Lady Sundon, with the old lady, called to pay us their respects. They came in the same carriage my dear wife had been accustomed to go in;—I therefore seized the opportunity of sending a couple of guineas to each of the footmen, and three guineas to the coachman; which was not bribery, but reward.

The ladies remained with us all day; and it was, indeed, one of the happiest days in my life. Lady Sundon was delighted at the issue of the affair, and with the heart her Majesty showed in it throughout; regaling us with the many agreeable things the Queen said to her on the occasion, with respect to the triumphant manner in which she had carried me through. I told her, Sir Robert had sent his compliments. She said that was a respect due to the Queen, but that I must return them by a visit. I told her that Lord Harrington had also done me the same honour. “He is my kinsman,” she replied, “and will be happy to serve you in any way. If you will accept it,” continued she, “he will lend you a carriage on Monday or Tuesday, to pay your visits.” I said I should be much obliged, not having any carriage of my own. We persuaded our kind friends to stay dinner; and the royal carriage was sent away, to return in the evening. The day sped away on halcyon wing; the conversation never flagged. Her Majesty—the minister—his jackals—or something connected with our shipwreck, and residence on Seaward Islands,—afforded topics in abundance; all, to us, most agreeable and interesting. My dear wife had put up the two plain gold pieces of tissue, which the tirewoman had extolled so highly, into two separate parcels; one of which she directed to “Lady Sundon,” and the other to “Lady Mary Wotton,” her dear old aunt: she had also given orders to have the parcels placed in the royal carriage, when it should arrive. On parting, Lady Sundon kissed my dear Eliza; who then said to her—"I have ventured to put something into the carriage, for your aunt and for your Ladyship; and if you do not accept it, I shall feel hurt." They then shook hands with us kindly, and took their leave.

On Sunday, we attended divine service at St. Martin's; and felt it our duty, if not altogether our inclination, to dedicate our afternoon to reading the Scriptures. "Ye cannot serve God and mammon;"—we began to feel the truth of this saying of our divine Master. "Let us not, my dear Edward," said my wife, "lose the favour of God, for all this world can bestow." We therefore read the Scriptures till late in the evening; and prayed fervently to God in Christ, for forgiveness of sins, and grace unto future righteousness and holiness of life.

On Monday, the minister's secretary called with the grant which had been signed by her Majesty, as Regent of the kingdom; and she had ordered the clause to be expunged, which entailed forfeiture on me, in case of my turning such grant in any way to my own profit, by sales of land or otherwise. I read it over, and expressed myself well satisfied. "I will pay you the money down, sir," said I, "and there is no occasion for a receipt; for I perceive the consideration money, 2000*l.*, is expressed in the deed."—"It is so, Sir Edward," he replied. I then drew out an order on my bankers for the amount, and handed it to him. He sat a while without saying anything; but I perceived there was yet something to be done. "Are there any fees, sir, to pay?" I asked. "I am directed, Sir Edward," he replied, "to demand no fees."—"But, sir," I resumed, "you have had some trouble in this business; and I beg you will do me the favour to accept this rouleau of gold;" putting a paper roll, containing fifty guineas into his hand: "and I desire my best thanks to Sir Robert Walpole, and that you will accept the same. He bowed courteously, and made some complimentary speech, which, like all such, vanished into thin air. When he was gone, my dear wife and myself congratulated each other on having at last obtained the object of our voyage; and we returned thanks to God, who by his power and influence over the minds and actions of his creatures, had accomplished this great matter for us.

On Tuesday, the Lord Harrington sent his carriage for me. I took the opportunity of taking my dear wife to the palace; and after leaving her there, returned his Lordship's compliments by a call, and then drove to the house of the minister. I wished to leave my name and drive away; but it seems I was expected, and the porter had orders to say Sir Robert desired to see me. I accordingly alighted, and was shown into the minister's library, without using gold or silver keys. He arose when I went in, and took me cordially by the hand; complimented me, then joked me; said he had supposed I was a Protestant, and a Whig; but that some others thought they could prove me to be a Papist, and a Jacobite. I comprehend the illusions, and bearing of all this; and only replied by a smile. "But now, Sir Edward," said he, "to be serious; if you were in parliament, whom would you support?"—"The Crown unquestionably," I replied.—"Then it follows," said he, "that you would support the minister of the Crown."—"So long," I rejoined, "as that minister endeavoured to uphold the dignity and prerogative of the Crown, with constitutional consistency, and by direct and honest means."—"Psha!" said he, "that is the way all novices talk. If," continued he, "a minister could find men as they should be, and not as they are, he could run at his business like a bull;

but, my dear young friend," added he, "you do not know what a minister has to contend with." I could not answer him, yet I was not convinced. After a short pause, "I think," rejoined he, "you cannot do better than take a borough: there will be one vacated in a few days; I know you can command it without injury to your fortune, and you owe it to yourself not to reject the opportunity offered; for without flattery, I venture to say, I perceive you are not wanting in nous, and only require a little intercourse with public men, to fit you for any honourable public employment; and I will take my chance of your support, on the grand connecting principle of loyalty." I thanked him, but assured him my mind was made up to return to my trans-Atlantic domain; and there I should be happy to make myself as useful to the King, and to his government, as opportunity might permit. "Are you fixed in your determination?" he said.—I replied, "I am, if with royal permission."—"Well, then," said he, "would you like to hold your appointment from us direct; or, as you have it, from the Governor of Jamaica?"—"That is as you may please, sir," I replied; "I should be sorry to desire anything that might not be quite proper."—"That is quite proper," he replied; "I will consider of it." The conversation now drew to a close; he shook hands with me, and with a smile, said, "I think I shall call upon you some day or other, to do service for us, among your Spanish neighbours on Terra Firma." I made my bow, and my exit; not a little glad to escape from the wily statesman. I called for my dear wife on my return, and had the pleasure to sit and converse with her friends a few minutes; after which we drove home, conversing on all that had passed between the minister and myself during our late interview.

A gentleman called on me to-day respecting the fees of knighthood: I made a thousand apologies, and really felt ashamed, the matter never having crossed my mind. He said in reply, it was quite time enough; and, at my request, made a list of the items, which amounted to 92*l*. I begged his acceptance of 100*l*., requesting him to make the disbursements for me, and apply the surplus as he might think proper. He received the money quite courteously; and paid me many compliments, by way of change, which I as courteously accepted, and he took his leave.

By the middle of the week, I received a friendly note from Lord Harrington, with an official letter as Secretary of State; enclosing a commission, signed by the Regent, but differing a little from that which was given me at Jamaica. The present one appointing me Commandant (the word Captain being omitted) and Governor of the Islands denominated, etc., with right of admiralty, and power to grant commissions, and appoint courts, agreeable to the jurisprudence of the realm, etc.; but in matters of general interest, not immediately local, to obey any orders or instructions that from time to time I, or any person holding the supreme situation at the islands for the time being, might receive from the Governor of the Island of Jamaica. "Ah, very well, dear Eliza," said I, "this will do; I am glad to have this: I was never quite easy under my former commission; it came in a questionable shape." I lost no time in making my noble friend due acknowledgments and thanks; for I felt that he had taken this handsome way of putting me in possession of the commission, to save me the fees of office; as perhaps it was the Queen's wish that no fees should be taken from me for it. The many gracious acts we received at the hands or by command of her Majesty, caused us often to reflect on the mysterious ways of Providence; by which our elevation in life, and I hope usefulness also, had been brought about. If the King had not been absent, perhaps, I should not have succeeded in obtaining the grant. If the Prince of Wales had not lost the confidence of his royal father, the Queen could not have been Regent, but he would have filled that high situation; and it is most probable, in that case also, I should have been disappointed in the object we now had so happily attained; accompanied, too, by so many other marks of royal favour.

In the evening, we got letters from Awbury, bearing our new titles on the cover. They were in acknowledgment of a few lines Eliza had written to her reverend and revered father, and to my sisters, just before the post went out, after receiving our unexpected honours. Her father's letter was such as might have been expected from such a man, on such an occasion. "My beloved child, bear your good fortune and your distinction with humility; that you may receive heavenly gifts also, from Him, who is the primary giver of all things." The letter from my dear sisters was in a different strain. "Dear! how they should have liked to see the Queen!" and so on.—"Well," said my dear wife, "we shall soon be able to go to them now! and indeed, Edward, I shall be glad when we do so; for I feel myself becoming more and more attached to our friends at the palace; and, to own the truth, perhaps I could give up all our old friends at the island, to remain here, if you were to express the least desire for it; therefore, my dear husband, let us make haste, for I am not insensible to the charms of this elegant and attaching society." I was not surprised at this declaration; the condescension and even kindness of the Queen, and the unparalleled courtesies of Lady Sundon to her, were calculated to make a deep impression on the feelings of one possessing so sensible and noble a nature. But I had no such allurements; I, therefore, felt no difficulty in backing her honest wishes, by assuring her I would do every thing in my power to expedite our departure: still, however, I had some things to do for our yet dear little trans-Atlantic home, before I could take my leave of London.

From what I had heard from a certain quarter, there was reason to suspect that a rupture with Spain might not be far distant. The Commissioners, although they had sat three years on the British claims, had not been able to obtain any equivalent redress or satisfaction from the Court of Madrid, for the depredations committed on British shipping by the guarda costas: I therefore was anxious to send out ten guns, for the battery I had ordered to be prepared on the open ground below the mansion; also some field-pieces or transportable guns, and a few musketoons; to place on swivel stocks in the boats, should they at any time be required. Captain Tracey was drawing near the period of his sailing for Jamaica, so that no time was to be lost; in consequence, I set off to go into the city, to consult my bankers about purchasing this artillery; when, on the way, I met Lord Harrington coming out of Somerset House; and as he condescended to stop and speak to me, I told him what I was going about. "They will cost you a great deal of money," he observed.—"I cannot help that, my Lord," I replied; "I wish to be ready, if anything should occur."—"I understand you, he replied;" you are a near neighbour to the Dons: but come with me; I think I can procure an order for all these matters, from the Ordnance; and that, in your case, is nothing more than right." I thanked him; and returned with him, first to Whitehall, where he said he had something to do; after which I accompanied him to the Master General's Office, and the thing was quickly accomplished. I received the order required, and hastened back with it to the city, to give it to Captain Tracey, if I could find him, which I did. He was right glad to meet me, having heard of the honour I had received at Court; and undertook to take in the ordnance stores immediately, if a lighter were sent with them from Woolwich. I desired him to hire a lighter for the purpose; he took the order, which, beside the guns I have mentioned, included powder, shot, etc. etc., and he promised to see to it without loss of time.

The next morning, very early, Captain Tracey called on me, to say the order would not be complied with, unless I myself went to the Ordnance Office at Woolwich. I lost no time in addressing myself to the business; so requesting my dear wife to accompany me, I sent for a chaise, and we set off, taking Greenwich in our way; where I called on my old acquaintance, Captain James, to take him with me: fortunately, I found him at home, and leaving Lady Seaward with Mrs. James, he posted on with me to Woolwich. The principal officer of the Ordnance was remarkably obliging, and not the less so on account of the presence of my friend Captain James. He said, the order would have been complied with on its first presentation, but they could not make out exactly the sort of guns required; he meant with respect to their carriages. I confessed the truth of his observation, and told him, the twelve-pounders were for a battery en barbette. "Then they require high, and traversing carriages;" said he. "And, sir," continued he, "as to the field-pieces, they are of brass, and rather valuable; but we have a great many in store, and as the order is only for two, there will be no demur about it. Now, sir," he added, "with reference to the powder and shot, you shall have an order at the Ordnance at Jamaica, if you please; and as I understand the stores are to go out in a merchant ship, I recommend this arrangement." I perfectly agreed with him, and he wrote the order. "Now, sir," he resumed, "with respect to the wall-pieces, they are all at the Tower,—you want six of them; I will give you a memorandum, by which you shall obtain them, by presenting it there." He asked me if I would like to pick out the guns, and carriages, and field-pieces; for which I thanked him; so he, and Captain James, and myself, went down to the wharfs, and made choice of those we most approved. "Now, sir," said he, "if you will give me a receipt for these things, they shall be sent off in one of the government boats to-morrow morning, and shipped on board the Phoenix." I thanked him for his zeal and courteous conduct, and wished to pay any fees that might be required. "We don't know what fees mean here, sir," said he; "we are something like you," continued he, addressing himself to Captain James,—“we are too glad of every opportunity to do our duty, without requiring any perquisites besides our pay.” I shook hands with this upright man, Mr. Forester, and returned with my friend to Greenwich, where we dined.

As there was no time to waste, having to finish my business in London, I requested permission to proceed, pressing Captain and Mrs. James to spend the day with us to-morrow, and accompany us to the Tower, which they promised; and on our return home, while I went to look after Captain Tracey, my wife wrote a note to invite Mr. and Mrs. Child to meet them at dinner; as we did not wish to go away without paying this sort of civility; and as Tracey, although only master of a West India-man, was a very respectable man, I asked him also; and left a note for Mr. Perry in passing.

Captain and Mrs. James came to us soon after breakfast, and we proceeded to the Tower. We saw all the curiosities there, so frequently described, besides three royal cub tigers, just whelped, the first that ever had been English born. After our visit to the wild beasts, I delivered my memorandum to the Lieutenant of the Tower, with whom we immediately went round the armoury; and I picked out half a dozen wall-pieces, bearing the mark of his late Majesty. These pieces are precisely like a soldier's musket, carrying a three-ounce ball, and fitted with a pivot and crutch, to fix in to the bore of a swivel stock; so that a man can bring the butt of the piece to his shoulder, and take a sight, and fire, without receiving the least kick from the rebound.

I had ordered the best plain dinner that could be served in the English mode, sans quelques choses of French cookery; and the best wines also, not however excluding the French. We sat down eight in number, the most comfortable party for a dinner table: we were not graceless, at which Mrs. Child stared a little. The dinner went off very well, and every one seemed to enjoy themselves; because there was no stiffness on our part, nor formal ceremony beyond that which good breeding requires. The ladies continued a good while with the dessert, and our banker's wife did honour to the wine; she soon became very voluble: "Did not like to sit long, after dinner—hoped Lady Seaward would soon retire to quadrille—wondered how she could put up with the attendance of none but the servants of the hotel—and certainly expected, by this time to have seen her fine taste displayed in an elegant and suitable equipage." Old Perry said, dryly, "Sir Edward keeps his stables in the Bank of England;" at which remark, our nautical friend laughed heartily, and my dear Eliza and myself smiled. The ladies in good time retired; and after taking some more wine and a bowl of punch, we joined them; but Mrs. Child could not make up a quadrille table among us all; we, however, proposed a sober game of whist, at which she was quite shocked; yet not being able "to exist without dear cards!" she was content to sit down to the old-fashioned alternative; and having made two tables, we all entered the lists; old Perry saying, "Now I like this, it is like old times." By ten o'clock, our guests left us, excepting Captain and Mrs. James, who remained in the hotel all night; and spent the next day with us, accompanying us to church.

On Monday, I saw Captain Tracey again, and gave him the receipt, to be delivered at the Tower; and a letter to the Master of the Ordnance at Jamaica, to take charge of the ammunition: and also letters for my brother, and Captain Drake, and one for Mr. Green at Kingston. Having done this, and feeling that our business in London was drawing to a close, we congratulated ourselves on the subject, and could not be sufficiently thankful for the happy termination of so arduous, and, at one time, unpromising, an affair. We now turned our minds to finish whatever remained yet to be done; and, in consequence, went to the jeweller, and got the perfume boxes, which had been elegantly completed according to order.

We had occasionally considered the subject of an equipage, so often pressed upon us by Mrs. Child; and sometimes felt that we really ought to have a lackey at least, and my dear wife a waiting-woman. However, as we had all attendance requisite, at the hotel, we wisely determined to be quite unlike upstart people, and not have any servants of our own, while in London. The subject now bore a different aspect;—we were going among our friends, and we thought that something was due to the rank and station her Majesty had conferred on us; and as our stay in England would be short, no great mischief could be done to my fortune, by three months' expenditure, in making such a figure as at least would not disgrace us in public opinion. I therefore determined to purchase a good travelling carriage, to be driven by a postillion; and, after some debate, we sent for our hostess, and requested her to recommend a valet to me, and a waiting-woman to Lady Seaward. After some little pause, she said, "she knew a nice young Frenchwoman (a relation of the tirewoman, who was a Parisian), a good scholar, a good milliner, who sung and played the guitar charmingly, and who wanted a situation."—"I shall be most happy," returned my wife, "to do anything to serve your friend, Madame Filibert; send for the young woman, and your friend her relation, this evening, and I will talk to them."—"As for the valet, Sir Edward," resumed our honest hostess, "they are all such a pack of rascals about town, I would not advise you to hire one till you go down into the country." We thanked her for her kind and disinterested counsel, telling her I would profit by it.

We now went out, to seek about among the coach-makers for a travelling carriage. There were carriages enough; but the new ones, of course, were without emblazonry, and those that were second-hand, bore the arms of other people. We had never thought on this, and could not help saying something about our dilemma. "Well, sir," civilly observed a coachmaker in Long Acre, "I can soon put in your honour's arms;—what are they?" I confess I felt extremely disturbed by the question; for I really did not know. My dear wife relieved me of my embarrassment, by saying,—“If we take the carriage, we will call on you to-morrow with the escutcheon.” He bowed, and I rather hastily withdrew, glad he did not know who I was; indeed, to tell the truth, I was ashamed to go back to him again. However, I lost no time in obtaining the Seaward arms from the Herald's office, for which I paid five guineas; but whether those I got had been manufactured or not for the occasion, I could not tell: I was, however, well pleased, and so was my dear wife, to see a dolphin for a crest, supported on a knight's helmet. And, as her honourable mind would not sanction anything like a scurvy trick, she sent for the coachmaker, and desired him to put merely the crest on the carriage, with the motto—" Mon Dieu et mon Roy,"—and to get it done as soon as possible, as we should leave London, perhaps, by the end of the week.

Madame Filibert, and her niece Rosalie, came according to appointment, and had a long interview with my wife. "I hope, madam," said the aunt, "you will treat her more like a companion, than a servant, comme une petite amie; for she is of a good family, although I who say so, am her relation. Her father was a Protestant clergyman, of the remnant of the Huguenots; but he and his brother my husband, died poor; and she and I, and my daughters, have sought in your country that protection we could not find in our own." My dear wife was a good deal affected; and promised to be a kind friend to her niece, if she should at all merit it,—which she hoped and believed she would. Rosalie appeared modest and intelligent; possessing a light and agile figure; and, upon the whole, quite engaging by look and in manner. The terms on which she was to serve, being arranged, it was further stipulated, that she should accompany her mistress to the Indies, if we required it. My dear wife was not forgetful, in her own mind, that we owed all our present success with the government, to the unconscious tire-woman; and she therefore was the more disposed to receive her niece on the most favourable terms; and, besides, was not indisposed to bestow some solid mark of her regard on the aunt. "Now, Madame Filibert," said my generous Eliza, "Rosalie must come to-morrow, and assist me in packing my things; and, as a token of my esteem for the aunt, and as a pledge of the kind treatment her niece may expect from me, I request that you, madam, will accept this small present;" giving her, at the same time, five guineas. This unusual act of generosity, surprised the good woman not a little, who returned a thousand remerciments to her Ladyship.

Early next morning, I gave a helping hand to my Eliza, to wrap the embossed perfume cases in two coverings of silver-paper; with the most delicate directions we could devise, placed between the first and second coverings. Soon after we had finished, Rosalie made her appearance; and she and her mistress set to work packing. I selected a few articles out of our gold and silver repository, to take with us; and then having the box containing the remainder put into a hackney-coach, I drove to Lombard-street, and deposited the contents in the iron chest, at my bankers. On my return, I found that Lady Sundon had just left the hotel. She had stopped but a short time with Lady Seaward, seeing she was busy: but made her promise to dine at the palace on Thursday, and to bring me as her page. While expressing her regret that we were so soon to part, this amiable woman put a valuable and beautiful ring on my Eliza's finger, saying—"Keep this for my sake; and when you are gone, be sure to write to me sometimes." I was much pleased with this fresh testimony of Lady Sundon's affection for her whose honour was my greatest delight.

On Thursday, we had the pleasure of dining with her

Ladyship, and her venerable aunt. After our dinner, my dear wife had a short interview with the Queen; who, in the kindest manner, asked if every thing had been done to my satisfaction; assuring my Eliza at the same time, that it would afford her satisfaction, at any future period to show us favour or protection, if we should require it. "Before I part with you, my dear Lady Seaward," continued her Majesty, "I wish to give you something, which I think you will value more than gold or jewels. When I passed through the Hague many years ago, I met Saurin;—I was then on my way to England. He gave me this excellent sermon, which is written in French by his own hand: I desire you to accept it; and sometimes to read it, in remembrance of me, and of the pious minister of Huguenot descent, its author;—he was an excellent man! At my request, he wrote a book for the use of one who has not profited by it as he ought; but in God I trust." The Queen paused a second, then resumed—"I believe, Lady Seaward, that you are one of the few who give glory and honour to God, for whatever good awaits you in life; and for this reason I lay aside the Queen, when alone with you; and I confess to you, that when I met M. Saurin at the Hague, I told him I was grateful to the Disposer of crowns, for that which I was about to wear; and I feel happy, my dear young friend, in this opportunity of laying open my heart to one I believe worthy of knowing, that Caroline of England's proudest title would be that of a true Christian woman." My Eliza thanked her Majesty with a silent tear of gratitude; and, kissing the hand that was held out to her with the book, curtsied and retired.

Before we parted from our kind friends in the evening, my dear wife took occasion to ask Lady Sundon as to the Queen's allusion, when speaking of M. Saurin, and the little book that had been written by him at her command. "Ah!" replied her Ladyship; "the Prince of Wales; it was written for him; but he has not profited much by it. God only knows what can induce him to act as he does; especially to his royal mother; who is both kind and just, and would lay down her life for his true interest and happiness: but he has had bad people about him. I don't like that Lord Bolingbroke," and some others: continued Lady Sundon, lowering her voice; "and now I will tell you a secret. These bad people, by their intrigues, have contrived to throw a firebrand into the palace, which has lighted up a consuming fire there; and has broken confidences, which formerly were undoubted. Her Majesty has been informed that Sir Robert is in secret correspondence with the Prince; and the information comes from a quarter that she may not doubt. Her Majesty has taxed him with it,—to which his answers have been rather equivocal. In consequence, she is much displeased with him, and takes every opportunity of showing it. This state of things vexes her the more, as, till then, she had entertained a favourable opinion of the minister.—But, moreover, he has contrived to send his brother to Hanover with the King, instead of Lord Harrington, to do the business of secretary of state there; and they manage it so now, that the Duke of Newcastle does every thing here; so that nothing is known, but at Claremont or Haughton. Dear Lord Harrington is, in point of fact, pushed by this cabal into the background; although they dare not take from him his office. And what is all this, as regards Lord Harrington, but some spiteful proceeding, on account of his straightforward undeviating principles! But the Queen knows his worth, and cannot be biased; and the King ought to know it too, by this time,—for he has been a faithful servant to the Crown for many years. But for the present, at any rate, the Walpoles have managed to poison the mind of his Majesty against him; so that he is not permitted to take much upon him in public affairs: but our gracious Queen, nevertheless, seizes every occasion to show him favour and respect." My dear Eliza, unwittingly, had touched her friend on a tender point; by which much more was elicited than intended. We were truly sorry at what we heard, although it contained information of some importance to myself to know: but my dear wife thought only of what kind and soothing things she could say to her friend, that might induce her to hope eventually for such a termination to this deplorable affair, as the wise providence of God would, in his own good time, bring about. Then, after taking a somewhat melancholy leave of our kind friends, we returned to the hotel.

By the end of the week, all our accounts were paid, our things packed, and every arrangement completed, including the carriage; and, on summing up all my expenditure, I found I should get out of London for 3120*l.*; taking in, the amount paid for the grant, my purchases, and other expenses. But as such occasions were not likely to recur, these disbursements, although heavy, gave me no sort of compunction or uneasiness. On Saturday, all was ready; yet, however anxious we might be to depart, not liking the idea of travelling on the Sabbath, we remained that day, and went to St. Paul's.

CHAPTER II.

ON Monday morning, the 8th of November, I sent off our heavy trunks to Bristol by the carrier. I then paid Mrs. Osborne's bill very cheerfully, not forgetting the servants; and with two small trunks and a bandbox, placed in the fore-boot of the carriage; and Rosalie, with our faithful little dog, and the two embossed cases, inside; we drove off with four horses, calling at the palace in our way, to take leave of our noble, and dear friends. Lady Sundon saw me from a window, hand my wife out, and she met us on the staircase: we were followed by Rosalie with the cases, who kept as close to us as she could, until we went into the inner apartments. The interview there, though short, was sufficiently demonstrative of the feeling that existed on both sides. "Edward," said my dear wife, "will you have the kindness to bring in those things?" I instantly obeyed. She then took the one from my hand, that was intended for the Queen, saying—"My dear Lady Sundon, implore her Majesty to accept this ancient relic, in remembrance of her most devoted servant." Then presenting the other—"Now, this is for yourself, my best friend! and you must not refuse a sweet token of my regard for it contains Indian perfumes. You will not be jealous of our royal mistress," continued she, "when you find hers more splendid than that I give to you."—"I cannot imagine what they are," replied her Ladyship, smiling kindly; "but believe me, my dear friend, whatever it is, I accept it for your sake! and however fine the Indian perfume may be, its coming from your hand will make it doubly so. And I am sure her Majesty will not refuse your other sweet offering; for as you have my heart, I am confident you have hers also." Saying this, her Ladyship kissed my wife most affectionately; tears stood in their eyes; and for fear of playing the woman too, I suddenly caught hold of Lady Sundon's hand, and pressing it gently, faltered out—"Farewell!" and made my escape, leaving Rosalie to conduct her mistress down the first flight of steps, where I waited to receive her. Lady Sundon stood a little above, with many a tender parting word upon her lips; thus was our last farewell! We then hurried down to the carriage, got in, and drove off by St. James's Street, for Oxford, on our route to Gloucestershire.

The roads proved excessively heavy and full of ruts, so that, although we had four horses all the way, it was as much as we could accomplish, to get into Oxford by bedtime, having been much embarrassed by the darkness of the evening.

Although we were anxious to embrace our much loved friends, yet it would have been unpardonable to lose this present opportunity of seeing the renowned University of Oxford; and accordingly we spent the whole of Tuesday visiting the different colleges and the Bodleian Library, leaving Rosalie at the inn to keep Fidele company; he, poor dog! like some other famed travellers, having no great stomach for books. We were much gratified by all we saw, and made some notes of it, to enable us to call up again to our recollection, more distinctly, the one and the other of these celebrated nurseries of genius and learning.

Early on Wednesday morning, we drove forward to Woodstock; and after breakfast paid a visit to Blenheim. The noble founder of the house of Marlborough, was no more, but his Duchess was still living. We admired the grandeur of this superb place, worthy of the object for which it was designed: but our chief pleasure arose from visiting the tapestry rooms; not indeed on account of the tapestry, for however curious and worthy it may be in point of the subject, and fabric, and brightness of the colours, yet the limning is altogether so wretched, that it is impossible to dwell on any of the pieces with delight. But the fine paintings of Carlo Dolce, and many other great artists, charmed us to the soul; although untutored in estimating the character or value of pictures, we felt as if we could have remained for ever gazing on them. The person who went through the rooms with us, named the painters as he described the pictures; but he did it with indistinct rapidity, hurrying us unpleasantly along. My dear wife seemed particularly distressed by his haste, when she was rapturously engaged in contemplating a picture of a Madonna, whose hand appeared to stand out from the canvass in all the roundness of perfect life: seeing this, I touched him on the shoulder, and taking him aside, slipped a guinea into his hand.—“Give us a little time, my good friend,” I said.—“As much as her Ladyship pleases,” he replied; so we then stood to admire whatever we thought worthy of admiration, and proceeded leisurely. At length, we came to the library, built much on the scale of Noah’s Ark: there was a fine statue of Queen Anne, in Parian marble, at one end, by an Italian artist, which we much commended. And having put my name down in a book on entering the mansion, we had nothing more to do on going away than to give some money to the servants; and not having time to visit the noble grounds, we returned to our carriage, and drove off on our route for Gloucester.

The roads and inns were abominable all the way; and the horses and tacklings, bad as could be, after we discharged the postilions who brought us from Woodstock;

sometimes finding it difficult to get the second pair of horses. We thought to take a late dinner at the village of Cheltenham; but things promised so miserably, that I ordered out our carriage again, with flambeaux-men, and drove on to Gloucester. We were comfortably lodged there, and had a good dinner or supper, or whatever else you may please to call it, about six o'clock.

Next morning we felt rather stiff, and thought a bath would refresh us; but the weather was too cold for anything but a warm bath, and there was no such thing to be had; so we made a virtue of necessity, and left the stiffness to wear off as it came; and as I had said to my Eliza's father, in my last letter, that we should be with him a little after the noon-tide of this day, I hurried breakfast, and took care to have four good horses, with decent-looking fellows for postilions; and about nine o'clock we set off in great spirits, for our native village, after an absence of a little more than three years.

As we drew nearer and nearer to the cradle of our childhood-years, object crowded on object, claiming our recollections and regard. At length, we saw the church, through the leafless trees; our hearts then rebounded with joy: the parsonage-house next appeared, and dear Mr. Goldsmith standing before the door. "Sit on this side, dearest Eliza!" said I, hastily, "that you may be next to your father, when the carriage door is opened." She quickly took the place, and the postilions pulled up; one of them dismounted like lightning, opened the door, and drew down the steps: he had scarcely got out of the way, when my beloved was in her father's arms, but not one word from either. I saw my three sisters in the background; and Eliza's two remaining sisters, clinging to their father and his darling child. The old gentleman, supported by his children, gradually drew towards their house-door; and then my own sisters came up to the carriage, from which I was descending, and received me with a like tenderness of affection. We followed into the house, where I embraced my only earthly father, with all the warmth of feeling, his own worth, and the worth of his incomparable daughter, inspired. Fidele did not wait for Rosalie; he had sprung out after his mistress; and now that higher emotions were softening down, the caresses of the faithful little dog were not unnoticed; every one had something to say to him; he seemed to know every body, and every thing, jumping and dancing about as if he would leap out of his skin. "This is a happy day for us, dear Fidele!" said my Eliza; still holding the hand of her father.

The things were taken out of the carriage, the postilions paid, and desired to leave it at Thornbury, to be taken care of there, until I might want it. Poor Rosalie had been much moved by the scene she witnessed, for we saw her in tears. One object had touched her closely; it was the father of Eliza, who reminded her of her own.

During the first week of our sojourn, nothing was talked of but our eventful history: my sisters being particularly interested about James; and the sisters of Eliza equally so in every thing connected with Amelia: for although they had all received letters long since our departure from Seaward Islands, yet the minutiae, the curious minutiae, of their situation and prospects, were objects of amusement as well as of anxious inquiry. Dear Mr. Goldsmith hung over our own story, with never-tiring avidity; every now and then blessing God for his providential care of us, and for the grace he had vouchsafed to put into our hearts. We told our good father, privately, every thing that had taken place in London; but beyond him, we did not think it prudent to make any disclosures. And we, moreover, confided to him the secret of our wealth, and all that had passed in our minds respecting it; telling him that he was the only person in the world, besides ourselves, that knew it. Which assertion, even he considered scarcely credible, until by repeated conversations, he was made acquainted with the cautious manner in which the business had been conducted throughout. The girls asked a multitude of questions about the Queen; but no answer seemed to satisfy them, how it came to pass that Eliza should be made her Ladyship. All they said, only caused a smile on her part; she was still the simple-hearted, single-minded daughter of the curate of Awbury.

One day my Eliza showed them the diamond cross, appended to the pearl necklace; and told them, her Majesty gave it to her, and fastened it with her own hand. That appeared quite like a fairy tale, that the Queen of England would condescend to do such a thing: she might, indeed, give the diamond cross! But they wanted to know for whose sake, and for what reason, all this was done. "My father has already told you," replied my sweet angel, "that the Queen thought my brave husband deserved the honour of knighthood: and she conferred it on him, and thus, through his honour I am honoured, and have the title of Lady Seaward: all else was grace on the part of her Majesty, if she chose to be kind to me."—"Dear girls!" I exclaimed, "the Queen loves your sister with an affectionate friendship; and, perhaps, the truth is, that I rather owe to her what she says she owes to me—all our honours!" The old gentleman could not dissemble his exultation, and delight, at this my declaration.

On Sunday, we had the supreme felicity of worshipping our God in the temple of our fathers; where every tender recollection was awakened; softening the heart, and exalting our devotional spirit. Many were the greetings we received in the churchyard, and on the way. It was gladdening to meet again our old schoolfellows, and friends; and to be caressed by the aged, who had been kind to us in our youth. Some of the gentry bowed to us; and some said, they would do themselves the honour of calling on us. Fame had magnified our riches; and the circumstance of having received a title, confirmed in the minds of many the most exaggerated reports. Early in the week, some of the most wealthy and respected of the country gentry called, to pay their respects. These compliments we in due time returned; but we refused all invitations to dinner; visiting, and carousing, not being our objects; yet we were not of an unsocial turn, but it was, that we aimed at higher pleasures.

The heavy trunks and packages, at length arrived from Bristol, and we now began to consider what was to be done during our stay at Awbury. My dear wife, as well as myself, had always been attached to arrangement, and liked to lay out her time to advantage. We had talked over the possibility of learning the French language from Rosalie, and books had been purchased in London for the purpose; they were now arrived, and Rosalie's guitar was come also. The days were short, to be sure, and cold, and the mornings dark; but, although these considerations affected out-of-door business, we had the same number of available hours within as at Midsummer; therefore due portions of time were allotted to study, and the rest to business, and to the society of our dear friends, or an occasional visiter. Thus, our days became fully occupied; yet finding time to write long letters to my brother James, and to Captain Drake; and soon after our arrival, I sent a very kind letter to my uncle at Bristol, promising to see him very shortly. My wife fulfilled her promise to Lady Sundon, and received the most agreeable reply; in which she transmitted a gracious message from Her Majesty. In this way the rapid week finished in the blissful day of rest, when we again met in the holy place of our childhood, hearing the word of God from the lips of our much-loved pastor. Not seldom we went to see my sisters, who occupied a neat small house in the village, but they more frequently came to us. Still, however, as the season was unfavourable to excursions beyond the threshold, much of our time was dedicated to reading, and more especially to the study of the French language under Rosalie, whose education had by no means been neglected. In this way our weekly hours were spent; but on Sunday the 5th of December, we had the divine privilege of receiving the blessed Sacrament of the Lord's Supper; a rite which both my dear Eliza and myself had anxiously desired; and if anything could have added to its welcome, it was that we received it from the hands of her venerable parent.

On Tuesday, letters were received from my brother James, with the pleasing intelligence that his wife had brought him a son. This was a subject of great joy, especially among the ladies; but there was one little omission, which somewhat marred the perfection of their ecstasy; he had not said what the child was to be called! In his letter to me, he stated that matters were going on well: several Spaniards had visited the islands, and one Dutchman from Curaçoa; and that he had turned the dollars pretty often to great advantage. He added, there had been some sickness, but no deaths; that they were much alarmed at one time for fear of the small-pox, it having been in one of the Spanish schooners; and he thought I ought to send a doctor to the settlement, for, in truth, he had been very uneasy on his wife's account, as there was no medical man at hand, if required. He described the people, as orderly and industrious; and spoke of my friend Drake in the highest terms; adding, that they all hoped soon to see us again, and that the mansion would be quite ready for our reception; and that three more houses had been built at Soldiers' Town, to complete the six allotments there, to be in readiness for any accession of settlers. This was all well, and it afforded great satisfaction to my dear Eliza and to myself.

We thought James right in advising a doctor to be added to the colony; but during our own abiding there, we had not seen sickness in any shape, therefore the idea had never entered our mind. I, however, now lost no time in directing my attention to the subject, and had many conversations both with my dear wife and her father respecting it; in one of which it was further suggested by the old gentleman, that if I thought a clergyman could be supported by any means whatever, I certainly ought not to let the colony remain longer without one, when it could be remedied; for the bread of life to the people, should not hang on the contingency of my presence, or the disposition of any one I might leave, to manage for me in my absence. His argument was conclusive as to the propriety of the measure. I, therefore, told him, it should be done; leaving the ways and means to future consideration. The good old man said, he could not desert his flock, or he would be happy indeed in going with us himself; but he would make inquiry, and had no doubt he should soon find a proper person. "He must be married," said I: "we shall find no difficulty in feeding his family. Marriage is our charter, at Seaward Islands. They are all married, or to be married; and I think they are all nearly mated, except my friend Captain Drake; and I intend my own sister, Maria, for him, if they should like each other! And we must have our doctor a married man too." My dear Eliza smiled.—"Observe," said she to her father, "how ardent he is! This is ever the way with him; he never makes difficulties. Now I know him so well, that I can promise you houses will be built, and grounds laid out, and every comfortable arrangement made for the reception of the gentlemen and their families, before they reach the settlement. But, indeed, I have seen him, poor fellow! almost at his wit's end to locate the people comfortable, when they came unexpectedly in a shoal upon him; negroes, and artificers, and soldiers, and their wives and children! he, however, did it.—Yes, my Edward," continued she—"you did it; and you did it well, as you do every thing." From her, this was no flattery, because she spoke the real sentiments of her heart. How far I deserved such an eulogium, is another question: but it was pleasing to her, to bestow it, and to me to receive it, and to her dear old father to hear it; and Goodnature too, if of the party, could not but be pleased also.

We had made up our minds to pay the promised visit to my uncle at Bristol, by the end of the week: and as I knew he would not suffer us to hide ourselves, some of our fine things were packed up for the occasion. Then having advertised him of our coming, we took Rosalie with us; and having ordered four horses to the carriage, we set off in a manner according with our station in life, and reached his door a little before noon. He was at home to receive us, and he did it quite in his old way. "Glad to see thee, Ned! dang it, thee's too fine; well, never mind, if all is right within."—I smiled, and shook him cordially by the hand.—"How is my aunt, sir?" said I: the old lady was not far off. "The better to see you, my dear nephew; and you, my dear girl," she exclaimed, meeting us in the passage, loading us both with kisses and hearty welcomes. Rosalie remained without, to see the things taken in; but my uncle insisted on doing that himself. "I beg you will walk in, ma'am," said he.—"Not if you please, sere;" replied the girl. The old gentleman did not quite understand what she meant by "not if you please, sere;" and besides he did not clearly comprehend who she was, being very well dressed: so he came back to us, and taking me by the uppermost button, whispered—"What's the matter with your wife's friend?—Is she huffed about anything? She won't come in; I asked her, and she said, 'Not if you please, sere:' what does she mean by that?"—I had much ado to keep my gravity. "Let her see to the getting out her mistress's things, sir," said I; "she is her waiting woman."—"The d—l she is," he replied; "a French waiting-woman, I suppose; well, she is a pretty maid, French or English; she shan't stand there: call her in, Lissey," cried he to my wife, "and I will see to your things, and pay the post-boys, and order the carriage to the Tolzey."—"Thank you, sir," I made reply; "manage the matter just as you please." Rosalie was called in; and my uncle was right glad at my having given him his own way. The old lady now asked us ten thousand questions, almost altogether; and among others, whether I had brought her any curiosities? She, in conclusion, thanked her niece for the silver tissue sent by Captain Taylor; then begged to be excused that she might see to the dinner, now ready. I was glad to find that no one had been invited, to meet us to-day; but on her return, being about one minute a head of the first dish, my aunt gave me to understand, that the Mayor, and one of the Sheriffs, with some other company, were to dine with my uncle to-morrow, to do honour to his nephew : and then I should see something like a dinner.

The old gentleman began his jokes, before the cloth was removed :—" Why didst not bring thy French cook with thee, Ned ? I suppose thee hast a French cook, as thy lady has a French waiting-maid. He would have knocked up some kickshaws for our feast to-morrow." A smile was my only answer to my uncle's wit. Then he had at me about my money, and the galleon, at which I laughed heartily : but my Eliza, not much liking the jest, took the liberty of setting him right on that point. He however made several attempts to find out what I was worth, but I always baffled him. I must confess, nevertheless, that I did not myself quite relish his strain of odd humour, so long continued ; and I became, in consequence, quite disposed to make my visit as short as possible.

Next morning, after breakfast, my dear wife and myself went out to purchase some things, and to draw for some money. On our way through the passage, we met a man carrying a couple of ugly-looking dogs in his arms. " What are you going to do with those dogs ?" said I.— " We've borrowed 'em from the neighbours," he replied, " to give our dog a bit of a help to turn the spit here to-day." I could not help laughing ; but Eliza thought the thing so strange, she wished to know more of the matter. We therefore turned back, and followed the man into the kitchen ; when, at my wife's request, the cook put my uncle's turnspit into the wheel, where he immediately fell to work like a squirrel in a cage, doing the business that a smokejack does in London, or weights and pulleys in other places. Her curiosity being satisfied, we retired, and went forth on our projected errands.

On our return, we dressed for dinner in plain suits. A little before two o'clock, the Mayor arrived ; and soon after him, Mr. Sheriff Elton. I really now felt uneasy as to my uncle's usual behaviour, fearing how he might conduct himself towards me on this occasion; for although I am not fond of state or ceremony, yet there is a certain respectful behaviour, at least before strangers, which should not be withheld even from junior relations; especially where adventitious circumstances have raised them in society. The old gentleman, however, to my great relief, behaved remarkably well. He had put on a laced waistcoat, and a new full-bottomed wig; and, perhaps, if he were not very scrupulous of respect for me in his own mind, he felt that he owed something to his waistcoat and to his wig. "Mr. Mayor," said he, "I have the honour to introduce my nephew, Sir Edward Seaward." After a few words from the Mayor to myself, and a reply, my uncle with great propriety took his Worship to the end of the room, where my wife was sitting, and introduced him to Lady Seaward. He then went through the same ceremony with the Sheriff, and six other gentlemen whom he had invited to meet us. Precisely at two o'clock the dinner was on the table, which must have been upborne by the shoulders of Atlas, to support the weight of all that was put thereon. When I contemplated the sirloin of beef, and all the other roasts, I thought on the poor dogs we had met in the passage. The Mayor sat on my aunt's right hand, and my wife took post next to him. I was on the opposite side, next to the Sheriff; the other gentlemen who took seats below, forced me into this situation. The Mayor, I perceived, was a person of high breeding; and evidently knew much of the world, and something of books: he talked a good deal with Lady Seaward, on subjects by no means common-place; and I heard him say, that the Mayoress would do herself the honour of calling on her Ladyship to-morrow; and he hoped they should have the pleasure of seeing us at their house, before we quitted Bristol. My aunt left the table soon after dinner, and my wife accompanied her. The old gentleman then passed the wine very freely, for a couple of hours; about which time, two enormous bowls of punch were put on the table; which were generally resorted to, while I drank nothing but red Bourdeaux wine; and thus, if I did not contrive to keep my tongue quiet, I kept my head cool; while all around me not only gave noisy, but other evidence of the potency of their beverage. The Mayor often said he would like some tea, and desired to retire to the ladies; but my uncle would not allow him to budge; and by way of consoling him I suppose, about six o'clock Welsh rabbits were brought in, and a great cider cup handed round. Most of the company partook of this treat, but I would not touch it. About nine o'clock we broke up; when I was very glad to ask my aunt for some coffee, and soon after to retire to rest.

In the morning, the family was ready for church; my uncle not feeling at all the worse, for his mighty dose the day before; but, on the contrary, seemed much more agreeable, now giving a truce to his jokes; so that we had a good deal of rational conversation in the interval of church-time. After supper, I endeavoured to give him some idea of the condition of the people, and trade, at Seaward Islands; and I took this opportunity of telling him, I wished to send a respectable medical man there, who should be made comfortable; but nothing beyond that, could be held out to him. He said, he "knew an ass of a fellow—a Scotchman too—who had been two or three voyages to the coast of Guinea, in a ship belonging to a friend of his; but who would not go there again, on account of what he considered cruelties, practised on the new slaves; although he and his wife were next thing to starving, for he had no other business nor dependance. "He is the very man for me," I replied, "if he can show testimonials of education." "Didn't I tell you he is a Scotchman?" exclaimed my uncle; "should not that be enough?" "Not quite, sir," I replied; "but, in my mind, it is something in his favour." "Thee art an apt scholar, Ned!" said he, dryly; "how many lessons didst have from the minister? Mayhap, he took thee for a Scotsman! They say he finds them the best of servants." "You would be a little severe, uncle," I replied; "but we pray you mercy, good sir." He felt himself now on an eminence, and laughed heartily at his imaginary triumph over his nephew, and Sir Robert Walpole.

On Monday, I lost no time in sending a note to Mr. Gordon, the Scotch doctor; stating, in part, my reason for requesting him to call on me. He very soon acknowledged my note in person, when I entered more at large with him on the subject. He was rather silent the while, and cautious in his answers, but occasionally putting to me a material question. After an hour's discussion, he said he would consult his wife, and consider of it, and would be glad to talk to me again about it; that it was altogether, as far as he could see, "an out o' the way business; but he might engage in it, if I could let him see his way clear."

In the course of the day, Mrs. Blackwell and Mrs. Elton, the wives of the Mayor and Sheriff, called; which visit, my aunt and wife returned in due course; and an invitation to a dinner at the Mayor's, on Friday, followed.

On Wednesday, Mr. Gordon waited on me again, and I was glad to see him. He appeared disposed to accept the situation; but he thought 50*l.* a year a small salary in the West Indies: and as to the accommodations of which I talked, that might or might not be, just as it happened; "he would like to have them specified."—"Mr. Gordon," said I, "it is your misfortune to take great pains in the present case, to misapply the good rule of hard but honest dealing: if you will throw yourself on my generosity, you shall have no reason to repent it."—"That may be true enough, Sir Edward Seaward," he replied; "but the teaching I have had, tells me not to trust to the generosity of any man." I said, "I was sorry to hear this;" adding, "I should like for your wife to wait on Lady Seaward, and perhaps they may succeed better than we do in settling it;" at which he smiled, saying, "he could not see much objection to that." He then got up to go away; on which I asked him, whether he had proper testimonials of his medical education. "Sir," he replied, "I have got my diploma in my pocket;" on which I bowed, and he took his leave. In the course of the afternoon, Mrs. Gordon came: she appeared a nice little Englishwoman, and rather well spoken, and genteel in her manner. I left her and my wife together, to settle this unnecessarily troublesome business; and they were closeted for nearly two hours. When she was gone, my dear Eliza recounted to me the heads of the conversation. Suffice it to say, she had succeeded in making the Doctor's wife desirous of going on my own terms; and the following day was appointed for putting a finish to the business.

While at supper, we were all much distressed by an account that just reached us, of a vessel from Chepstow for Bristol, with nearly a hundred passengers, having got on the sands last night; all of whom, excepting a few that escaped in the boat, had perished; and many of those lost were said to be people of Bristol, some leaving large families destitute. My kind-hearted uncle immediately said,—“While the story is fresh, it will be easy to raise some money for the afflicted survivors, and I will see to it to-morrow.” My dear wife and myself felt deeply on the occasion; and I desired him, in the event of a subscription being got up, to put my name down for any sum he pleased, not exceeding the chief magistrate’s donation, whatever that might be.

Mr. Gordon and his wife came to their appointed time. “Now,” said I, “Mr. Gordon, my uncle’s brig will sail about Christmas, which is very near at hand; I will pay your passage, and your wife’s, and take care that you have comfortable stores found you during the voyage. On your arrival at Seaward Islands, you shall be received into my brother’s house, where you will live as he does, free of expense, until a fit habitation be got ready for you: it will consist of a dining-hall, and two bedrooms: and some little land attached; and this you shall possess free of rent, so long as you remain practising your profession among us. I will advance you money to furnish your house: you shall have a male and female negro for your servants, so long as you behave well to them—which I flatter myself you will always do; and for their services no charge will be made, excepting that they must be fed and clothed at your expense. I will stock your poultry-yard and your grounds, at my own charge; and I will pay you a salary of 50*l.* a year, for your attendance on all the people; the medicines to be found at the public expense, or at mine. Will this do, Mr. Gordon?” continued I.—“It will do very well indeed, sir,” he replied, “but a written agreement is no bad cationer; and I suppose you will make no objection to give it me under your hand.”—“My word is my bond, sir,” said I, rather warmly; “but you shall have it in writing, as you desire it.” My dear wife fired at the request of

Mr. Gordon: she thought he had no right to require it; that his having done so, implied a distrust, which was highly insulting; besides, many of the offers made to him were purely gratuitous, therefore should not be altered in their nature, by turning them into an absolute matter of bargain: I saw the force of her argument, and began to think that this man's prudence, by running into the extreme, had assumed a vicious and rather troublesome aspect. After taking a turn or two in the room, I said to him—"I think we must break off this negotiation, Mr. Gordon; your mind and mine were not cast in the same mould: I fear I could not respect you, and hence I could not make you happy at the settlement; therefore I break it off." So saying, I bowed to the pair, and quitted the room, leaving them with my wife, to end it in any way she might think proper.

After I was gone, Lady Seaward spoke to him rather sharply on the suspicion he seemed to entertain of my integrity; adding—"I fear, Mr. Gordon, you must have met with very bad people, in your intercourse with the world, to be so suspicious."—"I canna say but I have," he replied; "I was two years in a Guineaman." His wife now set on the poor man without mercy, venting her spleen on him in no very measured terms. He took it all very quietly, saying at last to his wife—"I'll do anything you like; but there's neither sin nor shame in a man's desire to do business in a business-like way; and for this cause, I am reproached by you, and Sir Edward Seaward, and his lady here. I did not ask his name to a paper," continued he, "because I doubted him; so I'll now do just anything you like, wife."—"Well, then," she replied, "explain yourself to Sir Edward, when you see him, and ask him to look over your folly, and give you the situation; for let me tell you," added she, "there are many much better off than we are, that would be glad to jump at it." Thus finished this interview of Mr. Gordon and his wife with Lady Seaward; and they then took their leave, the Doctor having left rather a dubious impression on her mind respecting him. He, however, wrote a note to me the next morning, which was meant as an apology for what had passed; requesting I would blot it from my memory, and give him the situation on my own terms. In reply to this, I desired him to call on me with his diploma, and that the business should be done; accordingly he came without loss of time, and the affair was concluded.

This day being Friday, we were engaged to dine at the Mayor's; and I thought it due to the occasion, to put on our full dress. My poor aunt, not accustomed to go out to dinner parties, consulted Eliza about her finery: there was one thing the old lady much wanted, and that was a handsome necklace and earrings. "Now, my dear aunt," said Eliza, "when I was going to be married, my uncle sent me 100*l.* which was very acceptable; and which you, my kind aunt, assisted me to lay out to the best advantage. Now, that it has pleased God to give us plenty of money, I wish to return the 100*l.* in some way or other; but I know, if I were to offer it in money to my uncle, it would affront him: therefore, let us go, and lay it out in diamond earrings, and a handsome necklace for yourself; and when you have put them on, you can thank him for his elegant present." My good aunt required little more to be said; thinking her niece as sensible as she was generous and honest: and while the old lady was getting ready, Eliza came to me, and told me what she had done. I was glad of it, and immediately gave her a draft on London for the money. They went out; and I thought they never would come back:

my uncle got out of all patience, for fear we should keep the Mayor waiting dinner. At last, they made their appearance. My dear wife soon dressed herself, and sent Rosalie to assist in doing the same to my aunt; who, however, did not make quite so much haste. We of the masculine gender were fully attired long before the ladies, or, at least, before my aunt was ready; and were in waiting for them below. My poor uncle, not being able to sit quiet one minute, had been walking constantly up and down the room, looking at his watch every now and then; and sometimes going to the bottom of the stairs, he would bawl out—"Dorothy, we shall be too late!" till at length, fidgeted into fatigue, or despair, he sat down in his arm-chair, and began a stave of "George Riddler's oven." At last, her quick footstep was heard on the stairs, which set him on his feet; and he began to chuckle and smile, just as she sailed into the room with all the airs and graces that the consciousness of fine apparel is said to bestow on the peacock. "Thank you, deary, for your elegant present!" she exclaimed, pointing to her diamond earrings and necklace. "Very grand, indeed," he replied: "I suppose your niece lent you those fine kickshaws."—"No, sir, my niece did not lend them to me, but bought them for me with your money; for which I am very much obliged to her and to you."—"Nonsense!" he ejaculated, with a querulous tone. "Come away, Dorothy, we shall lose our dinner!" so giving a truce to parley, we stepped into a hired coach, my own carriage not being large enough, and drove direct to his Worship's house.

In about an hour after our arrival, we sat down to a superb dinner, surrounded by a company equally well chosen, and sumptuously dressed. I had the pleasure to sit next to General Grenfield's lady, who had been at Jamaica. She said, she was enchanted with Lady Seaward, with whom she had conversed before dinner; and wished much to cultivate her acquaintance: and as we were about to return to the West Indies, she would be happy to give her letters to an old schoolfellow of hers, Miss Crawford, who, by this time, she had reason to believe, was Mrs. Trelawney. My wife sat next to the General, who was on the right hand of the Mayoress; and I was happy to observe the great attention she received from him, and every one near to her. The day went off uncommonly well: we did not sit many hours after the ladies; but, as soon as the grace-cup went round, retired to the drawing-room, where there was tea and cards. Here I had a good deal of conversation with General Grenfield: we talked much of Jamaica, and of the conduct of the Spaniards. He was both curious and minute in his inquiries about Seaward Islands: he thought, in the event of a Spanish war, they might be made a valuable point d'appui, from which the enemy could be greatly distressed. He said, "in the event of a war, he suspected I should have more visiters than would be agreeable to me; that when the importance of the position was understood, it would be a bone of contention." We took leave of the Mayor and his lady about ten o'clock, well pleased with our entertainment; and equally so with the company, among whom I made some agreeable and well-informed acquaintance.

On Saturday morning, I entered upon arrangements with my uncle, about sending Mr. Gordon and his wife out in the Mary, to the islands; and, by my request, Captain Taylor was invited to dinner, that I might talk that matter, and some others, over with him. In the course of the day, General and Mrs. Grenfield called; and they were much disappointed when we told them we must leave Bristol on Tuesday: however, we promised to visit them on our return, previous to embarking for the West Indies. Captain Taylor came to dinner, as I had requested; which afforded me the opportunity I so much desired, of talking to him on our trans-Atlantic matters. He made no objection to his passengers; agreeing to take them for 25*l.* each, and find them in comfortable provisions. He was to carry out a considerable investment for my brother in merchandise, to be shipped by my uncle, with which I had nothing to do. But we settled a list of such things as I should want for my own establishment, and to dispense to others; which my uncle undertook to get, and Captain Taylor promised to take charge of. Among these were bedsteads and mattresses, and table and culinary necessaries, for the doctor and parson.

On Sunday, we attended divine worship at the Cathedral; and in the course of the day visited the fine equestrian statue of King William, which had just been set up in Queen Square, executed by Mr. Rysbrack.

I sent for Mr. Gordon on Monday morning, and told him, the vessel would sail in a week or thereabouts; and desired him to order a medicine-chest to be fitted up to the amount of 20*l.*, to be marked with my name; the bill to be sent in to my uncle. "And now, sir," said I, "would a small advance of money be of use to you?" He replied—"I shall hae much need o' that;" adding, that he owed some money in Bristol, and could not go away without paying it. "If it is a fair question, Mr. Gordon, how much may you owe?"—"Perhaps, sir," he answered, "about 50*s.*, or 3*l.* at most."—"Well," I resumed, "you can have that sum; but you will want some more."—"I dinna see that, Sir Edward," he replied; "you say we are to be found in necessaries."—

“That is very true,” I rejoined; “but you may want some light clothing for yourself, or for your wife; besides some additional shoes, perhaps, and many other matters: would you like to take 10*l*.?”—“I am not sure how that should be,” he replied.—“Let Mrs. Gordon, then, call by-and-by,” said I: “she and Lady Seaward shall talk the business over; and whatever money she may think well to have in advance, you, I suppose, will not object to it?” “Just that,” was his answer. And just thus we settled it; and I saw him no more till I met him again at St. George’s Island. He, however, soon sent his wife to us; who understood better than he did, what they might require, especially after having had some conversation with Lady Seaward; when it was fixed that they should have 25*l*., which were paid over to her, and for which I took her receipt.

We contrived, in the course of the day, to return General and Mrs. Grenfield’s visit, who then kindly gave us the promised letter; and afterwards we made a call at the Mayor’s. Having now arranged every thing with my uncle on matters of business, and given him a draft on London for 250*l*., which was calculated to cover the amount of the supplies to be sent on my account by the Mary, and also the amount of passage-money for the Doctor and his wife, we prepared for our departure next morning.

Breakfast being over, the carriage came to the door; the trunks then being placed, and the other things got in, we took an affectionate leave of our hospitable friends. Feeling that I had forgiven my uncle for his rough and rather rude jokes, I presented him with a gold snuff-box, as I shook him by the hand; with which mark of my regard, he evidently was highly pleased; and after a few more good-byes, Rosalie having got in first by the desire of her mistress, we quickly followed, and our postilions drove off with as much speed as several obstructing carts and sledges would permit.

On our arrival at Awbury, I found a packet under cover of a Secretary of State's frank: there was a letter in it for me, and a note for my wife. The former, from the Under-secretary of State, by command of his Grace the Duke of Newcastle; the latter, from the Queen. After I had read my letter, I laid it down, saying—"Here is something for me to do, indeed!" "You will not hesitate to do it, I know," said my dear Eliza; "the Queen has written to me about it;" then opening her Majesty's note again, she read a few lines of it aloud—"They are my country people; I am sure you will use your influence with your husband to comply with the request of government, and that you will be kind to them for my sake." "Indeed I will," exclaimed my wife; "and I am sure you will be so too, my honoured husband!" "What is it?" said Mr. Goldsmith. "Some German families," I replied, "that came over to England to go to Georgia; but who arrived too late to go out with a body of people, just sailed for that colony. And you will perceive by the official letter, that I am requested 'to take them out, and locate them at Seaward Islands.'" My father-in-law read the letter; and could not help observing, that it was rather strange the request was not qualified by some intimation as to the manner of their transport from England, at least. "That is what struck me," I replied. "Well, never mind that," said Eliza; "let us reply to these letters immediately; assenting to the request in the handsomest manner. You can then state, that if government will convey the families to Jamaica, you will have a vessel there ready to take them to Seaward Islands; and that you only have to regret your being obliged to give any trouble whatever, in a business confided to you." "Well, dearest," returned I, "it shall be done as you say; but you perceive there are twelve families; in all, nearly forty persons; and unless government makes some provision for them, I must be at the expense of feeding them all, for at least six months after their arrival, besides the cost of locating them." "Do it, my dear Edward," she replied; "without counting the cost, do it; because they are wanderers without a home, and because they are the country people of the Queen, and the heart of your wife is with them." Her appeal moved me to tears; I threw myself on her neck, saying—"It is done!" The old gentleman was much affected by what had passed; and he gloried in the triumph of his daughter, and humanity, over cold calculating lucre.

No time was lost, in replying to these letters. My letter to the Under-secretary of State, was written agreeably to my Eliza's suggestion; adding, that I should be happy to know when I might expect to find the people at Jamaica: and, that in case of their arriving a few days before the vessel from Seaward Islands, I would advise their being landed at Port Royal, and lodged in the artillery barracks; also to be allowed army rations until I could remove them; after which they should incur no further expense on the government. My dear wife was pleased with my letter; the perusal of which, she said, would enable her to write to the Queen in a proper frame of mind. She then sat down, and soon wrote her reply. It was an admirable letter for the occasion. I preserved the copy of it with great care. I was surprised to see with what ease she did a thing, which, to most people, would have been an undertaking of great difficulty.

Copy.—"May it please Her Majesty, to accept the grateful thanks of her most devoted servant, whom she has just honoured with fresh proofs of confidence and esteem. The task your Majesty has confided to me, shall be performed with assiduity and tenderness; I will watch over the necessities of your country people, with all the care your own royal feelings would suggest; and it will be my happiness to think, that in so doing, I am but the proxy of your Majesty. Recommending my dear husband and myself to your Majesty's esteem,

“ I have the honour to be, Madam,

“ Your most grateful and dutiful servant,

“ ELIZA SEAWARD.”

“ Aubury, Gloucestershire,

“ Dec. 22, 1736.”

Such was the letter, which the Queen afterwards showed to Sir Robert Walpole; and, I know, accompanied by an expression worth repeating:—“ Sir Robert, somebody said, or it has been said for them, that women have neither head nor heart. I think here is a proof of both.”—“ No one could be guilty of such heresy,” replied the minister, “ in an age when your Majesty is so splendid an example of the contrary.” — “ Then they belie you, good sir!” returned the Queen.—“ My friends say some good things for me, may it please your Majesty; and when my enemies undertake to say bad things for me, which they often do, I then should be happy if it might not please your Majesty.” The Queen, I am told, could not help laughing; and the conversation took the turn originally intended.

The letters were sealed, and sent off under cover to the Duke of Newcastle, from whose office they had been forwarded.

During dinner, my dear wife and myself had a great deal of deep conversation about locating the German families; and also respecting establishments for the clergyman, and for the doctor : in all which Mr. Goldsmith took great delight; and, to enable him the better to comprehend the subject, I laid a map of the islands before him in the afternoon—to which he referred frequently during our discussion. I took this opportunity of telling him, I had engaged a medical man; who, with his wife, were to go out immediately in my uncle's brig: but that I proposed taking the clergyman with myself; so that there would be plenty of time to find a suitable person. "And now," said I, "to-morrow I must occupy myself in writing long letters, ordering arrangements to be made for the reception of all the strangers; and I humbly implore the direction of God, to enable me to do well."—"I like that spirit," said the old gentleman: "depend upon it, Edward," continued he, "that is the fountain of all your honours, and your happiness."

Next morning, I set to work upon my letters, which I wrote very much at length;—one to my brother, one to Captain Drake; and one to Mr. Green, at Jamaica; in which I endeavoured to embrace every point that the intended movements might require. I requested my brother to entertain Doctor Gordon in his house, until one could be got ready for him; and, as the Doctor was sent out by James's own particular desire, I thought he of course would not hesitate to give him this hospitality. I directed four acres of ground to be cleared for him, between Allwood's lots and the spring on Edward's Island; and a house to be built for him there, on the original plan of our mansion at the Fort. I called it the Fort; for I hoped, by the time he got my letter, the guns sent from Woolwich would be mounted. I desired Mr. Green to provide framework and shingles for two houses, and whatever else Captain Drake might require, on my account. I intrusted Drake with the Germans, when they might arrive: desiring them to be located along the west side of St. George's Island, upon the best land, divided into suitable lots; and to provide them with a four-oared boat; and to bring a supply of yams, and Indian corn, and molasses, with him from Jamaica, for their use, when he came to convey them to the islands. I now wrote to my uncle, to send out by Taylor ten barrels of Irish beef, and as many of pork, together with forty bags of bread, on my account: and my letters being finished, I sealed them, and sent them off, under cover to my uncle, with others from the family, for James and his wife,—congratulatory, no doubt, on the birth of their son and heir: and this being accomplished, I was glad to give a truce for awhile to business.

CHAPTER III.

THE present week was to be full of the sacred season's festivities, with great doings amongst the gentry. The little boys and girls of the neighbourhood were already going about in the evenings, singing their Christmas carols at the doors of the village. Saturday would be Christmas-day, and all hearts were joyous at its anticipation. At different times, I had conferred with Eliza's father, on some mode of helping the poor of our native place; but as yet we had not come to any precise determination: it was, however, agreed that the present season would afford a fit occasion of demonstrating my kindly feelings towards them. Accordingly, he made a list of the poor cottagers and others; for whom bread, and bacon, and beer, were now amply provided by my order, and served out to them by the beadle: a trifle in money, also, was added to the boon, by the hand of their worthy curate. Our young damsels kept the parsonage in a bustle, making mince-pie meat and plum-puddings: my sisters were to keep Christmas at the parsonage; and a couple of old gentlemen farmers, friends of the family, were invited to the dinner.

When the day arrived, the church looked quite a garden, dressed in its holly; and we were happy to see again that well-remembered commemoration of the Nativity. On our return, the yule log was on, and the table laid: a hearty dinner was soon served up; and great justice quickly done to the roast beef, and plum pudding, and mince pies. In the evening, Rosalie favoured us with some pretty French and English songs, accompanied by her guitar; and my dear Eliza sung; and the merriment went round. Then came St. George and his train, desiring admittance: they were dressed in the most grotesque manner. One boy was St. George, another was his horse, another the dragon; then came his squire, and a doctor, and so forth. St. George mounted his horse, and attacked the dragon nobly; but the beast wounded him, and unhorsed him; on which the doctor takes the elixir from his pocket, saying—

“ Here, take the spirit of elecampane; Rise up, St. George, and fight again.”

In a moment he is restored—he mounts—the dragon falls, and is dragged off in triumph. The valiant knight, with Membrino's helmet, (the barber's basin of the village, borrowed for the occasion,) quickly returned to us for our favours; into which some sixpences were thrown, besides halfpence, as a reward for the performance. After supper we drank punch, and our young gentlewomen played at snap-dragon. This dragon vomited fire fiercely; but the ladies held him as cheap as St. George had done, when encountering him in another shape; nevertheless, they were obliged to have recourse to some latent charm in their own tongue,—applied by licking their fingers, after every snatch at the raisins; for they were lodged in the fiery jaws of the blue-burning dragon. Thus finished the festivities of our Christmas-day at Awbury; happy in seeing every one around us happy.

Sunday followed; a holy day rather than a holiday: but both days were holy: the first commemorative of His coming, to win for us that Rest of which the second is the type on earth; and into which He on that day entered, “to prepare a place for those who love him.”

On the following morning, my good father-in-law and myself had some conversation on a subject mentioned by Mr. Giles, one of the old gentlemen that dined with us on Christmas-day. He had said that Colonel Tomlinson's estate was to be sold by auction at Gloucester, some time next month, to pay off a gambling debt he had got into at Bath. I stated to Mr. Goldsmith, that I was anxious to invest some of my money in land; for the funds, at present, did not give more than three per cent.; and I felt confident we must soon have a Spanish war, and that then they would fall low enough. In consequence, we set an inquiry on foot, and found the rumour to be true; for in a few days handbills were sent about, announcing the day of sale, at the Booth-hall in Gloucester. We lost no time in visiting the property, which lay about seven miles from Awbury; and I took our two farmer friends with us, to explore it,—which investigation occupied us nearly three days, and then they made up their minds as to what it was worth. The land generally speaking was found to be good; but the mansion rather mean, and the grounds round it in miserable condition.

On the 14th of January, the day of the sale, my dear Eliza, and her father, and myself, went to Gloucester; and leaving her at the King's Head, we walked over to the Booth-hall. A plan of the estate was there exhibited: it contained 1750 acres. As soon as the company collected, the rent-roll, in which the leases, rates, tithes, etc. were stated, was then read: after which the auctioneer declared ten per cent. must be paid down, as deposit money, by the purchaser; and that a good satisfactory title would be given, before the payment of the whole money was required. The estate was then put up, and the bidding soon became very brisk. I did not bid till it got up to 20,000*l.*; I then bid 500*l.* more. No one seemed disposed to go further; but a stranger coming in, ran it up to 23,500*l.* I then bid another 500*l.*; on which it was knocked down to me. "It is yours, sir;"

said the auctioneer: "your name, if you please?"—"Sir Edward Seaward," I replied. On giving my name, there was a considerable buzz in the room; and the eyes of the company, generally, were turned on the purchaser. In a second or two I heard a person not very far from me, say—"Who is this Sir Edward Seaward?"—"Why, hav'n't you heard that he was a post-boy, or cow-boy, or farmer's boy, or something like, at Thornbury?" replied a red-faced squire, that made one of three who were discussing the point. Without saying a word to dear Mr. Goldsmith, I instantly stepped across the room, beginning to speak as I advanced.—"Gentlemen, I beg leave to inform you, that I never was either a post-boy, or a cow-boy, or a farmer's-boy, at Thornbury, or anywhere else; but I was the son of a poor but honest farmer at Awbury, and now, by the blessing of God, I am what I am: but I should disgrace my father, were I ashamed of what I was." As I spoke, you might have heard a pin drop; and when I had concluded, several gentlemen introduced themselves to me, desiring the honour of my acquaintance; among whom, a worthy Baronet stood forward, observing, that he could not sufficiently respect me for the manly way in which I had come forward on the present occasion.

The auctioneer now asked for his deposit-money; which I paid by a draft on my banker. This being done, we went to an attorney in Gloucester, well known to my father-in-law. I desired this gentleman to see the business properly settled; and told him, when the deeds were complete, and myself put in possession, the money should be forthwith paid down. Highly pleased with all I had done, we returned to our dear Eliza, and told her that I had purchased the Hartland estate. Dinner was soon put on the table; which to us was very acceptable, after the fatigue of an anxiety inseparable from so momentous an undertaking. After dinner, I wrote to Perry and Co., advising them that I had drawn for 2400*l.*, being deposit-money for an estate I had just purchased; and that in a week or ten days, I should have occasion to draw for 24,000*l.*, less the deposit-money; and to enable them to meet my draft, I desired them to sell 20,000*l.* stock. When my letter was finished and despatched, the day was pretty nigh shut in, so we determined to postpone our return until the morrow: we, therefore, drew comfortably round the fire, and ordered a bowl of punch; enjoying the evening in delightful conversation—a happy trio—loving and beloved.

Previous to our departure on the following day, we visited the Cathedral for the purpose of seeing what, Mr. Goldsmith stated, could not be seen elsewhere; the three successive styles of English architecture, comprised within the walls of one building. He seized the opportunity of explaining this perplexing subject to us; by the examples which stood before us. Here was the more ancient, clumsy, Saxon arch and pillar; there the equally solid Norman shaft, with its arch equally solid and semi-circular; but being ornamented with the zig-zag and roses, declared it to be the production of a later era. The great body of the church, somewhat distinct from the rest, displayed fascies of small and beautiful shafts, supporting elliptical arches towering and hanging as it were in the air. This, he said, was the last effort of monastic genius in cathedral architecture. The day being cold, and our visit being rather short, this is all I can remember; excepting that we saw a fine recumbent statue, or effigy, of the unfortunate King Edward, who was murdered in Berkeley Castle about four hundred years ago, and whose body is reported to lie buried beneath this well executed marble.

We returned to Awbury to a late dinner ; where my sisters were invited to meet me. They were highly delighted with the information they received of my having bought Hartland ; and I added to their happiness, by imparting to them an arrangement made last evening, round the inn's fireside, respecting themselves. "As soon as I get possession," said I, "you three shall go, with Eliza and myself, to inhabit Hartland House. And as all the furniture is to be left, excepting plate, glass, china, and linen, there will not be a great deal to do, to render it tolerably comfortable. About the middle of April, we intend to return to Seaward Islands ; and it is our wish, dear Maria," continued I, addressing myself to my youngest sister, "to take you from your sisters, and that you accompany us, leaving Grace and Anne to take care of the house in our absence. And when we return, we will live all together ; unless some of us be otherwise disposed of ; or my elder sisters shall have a house to themselves, with a comfortable income as long as they live." Maria was delighted at the idea of going with us ; and the others were equally so with their home prospects. The morrow was the Sabbath, which to us is always a day of peace and holy joy.

Thursday brought letters from Messrs. Perry and Co., with an account of the sale of my South Sea stock ; and most satisfactory it was : the great rise in the fund being quite unexpected, having reached 111 ; so that the 20,000*l.* stock fetched 22,200*l.* money.

But I received a private letter also from Mr. Perry, congratulating himself and me on the handsome sum I had realised by the sale ; not less than 5,000*l.* : and he would now most strenuously advise me to sell the whole of it, since it had got up so high ; for notwithstanding the defeat ministers had met with in the last session of parliament, in their attempt to pay this stock off, it might not always be the case: and he therefore would advise me to purchase East India shares, which were now at 176, but which bore an interest of six per cent.: a most advantageous transfer. My remaining 49,532*l.* three per cents., say at 110, would purchase 30,956*l.* in India shares; the interest in the threes on my remaining sum being 1485*l.* per annum; whereas in the India shares, under existing relative prices, it would be 1854*l.* I lost no time in replying to Mr. Perry's most friendly letter; requesting him, without delay, to sell all my three per cent. stock, and purchase East India shares as he had suggested; thanking him for the great services his zeal and his intelligence had already rendered me.

On Monday, the 24th, we heard of the narrow escape of the King in attempting to cross the Channel, and of the great alarm of her Majesty on the occasion; but that he had now safely arrived, and that congratulatory addresses were pouring in from all quarters: and my dear wife also felt it her duty to write a congratulatory letter, through Lady Sundon, to the Queen; which, not many days after, her Majesty most graciously acknowledged with her own hand; taking the same opportunity of thanking her "dear little friend," for her "inestimable letter respecting the poor Germans."

On the following day, Mr. Wilson, my attorney, accompanied by the attorney of Colonel Tomlinson, called on me with the title-deeds of Hartland; which were duly executed, perfect, and satisfactory. My good father-in-law ordered dinner early; and, in the mean time, I showed the gentlemen of the law my banker's account, to assure them there were funds. I then drew out the bill for 21,600*l.*, and put it in my pocket. The carriage and horses were sent for; and after taking a hasty dinner, my Eliza and her father stepped into it; the two attorneys being in a post-chaise. We all went over to Hartland; where I was put in possession before three witnesses, and the deeds delivered. I then paid over my draft on London, to the Colonel's attorney; and the business being thus finished, we returned to Awbury.

Next day, the Colonel's steward and all the tenants waited on me at the parsonage; which made a great bustle in the village. I received them with proper civility, but postponed entering on business of any kind. I told the tenantry, I would appoint a day for seeing them at Hartland House; but declined the offer of the steward's services, saying, I should have no occasion for them. He said, "A good steward was a necessary and useful person; he knew how to make the most of the estate; and never objected to advance half a year's rent to his employer, if required." I told him, I gave him all the credit he desired; but neither of the points he had put forward, could be of the smallest importance to me; and that I had made up my mind.

There were no inmates in Hartland House, but the gardener and his wife, whom I had told I should retain. And I then desired the wife to hire a couple of women; and get in a load of coals, and some soap, and make fires in every room in the house, and scour it down from the garrets to the kitchen; as we should come over, to reside, on Monday next. I wrote to my uncle without delay, informing him of my purchase; at the same time requesting him to hire a footman for me; and to give my wife's dear love to her aunt, wishing to have a good cook and two housemaids from Bristol. The servants arrived on Saturday morning, with a congratulatory letter from the old gentleman. They were immediately despatched to Hartland, accompanied by my two elder sisters, and a pannier of provisions; my sisters being requested to remain, and see that every thing was put in order for us; and to give them more time, we deferred our coming till Tuesday; making use of the intermediate days, to order from Bristol such articles as would be required for housekeeping. By Tuesday the supplies were procured, and sent over; and after dining with our good father, my dear Eliza, with Rosalie and Fidele, drove over to our new abode. They had made the place very clean; and we were much gratified by the improved aspect in which we now beheld it. A few days ago it was all gloom and filth; now it was all cheerfulness and cleanliness. The fires were bright; and the servants were about, and smiling. The tea-things were on the table, and the candles ready to be lighted; and my two sisters right gladsome to see us, and to see us so well pleased with our reception.

In the course of the week, we made ourselves quite comfortable in our new home; and I wrote to Bristol, to job a couple of horses, and a coachman to ride postilion, for three months; which was about the time I had allowed myself to remain in England. Liveries were got for the men, and every thing arranged "comme il faut," as Rosalie had taught us to express it. On the first Sunday after our removal, which was the 6th of February, we brought back with us my dear sister Maria, whom we had left at the parsonage; and on the following day Eliza's sisters, and their worthy father, came over and spent the day with us. I prevailed on him, during this visit, to undertake the stewardship of the property; and we agreed on an outline of conduct to be pursued towards the tenantry; and, in making a new let, to take the price of wheat for our guide, now 4s. the bushel. I appointed the tenants to meet him and me at the house on Thursday; when all points were explained to the general satisfaction: one of which was, that I intended to build twelve small cottages, with three acres of land attached to each, in suitable situations, for poor industrious families; and if I wanted a bit of land from any of my tenants, to accomplish any part of that plan, I expected it would not be refused on equitable terms.

The grounds and the garden belonging to the great house, were altogether in a most ruinous state; I therefore hired a couple of men to assist the gardener, and I had the pleasure to see great progress made in putting them in order. By the middle of the month, we were quite settled, and every thing going on like clockwork: for my dear Eliza, as well as myself, was a great admirer of order, and method, and circumstantial arrangement; which is the great secret of good and successful management.

It was not long before we received visits from all the first people in the neighbourhood; and as it was no secret that my wife corresponded with the Queen, Lord and Lady Berkeley did not think us unworthy of their attention. We duly returned all the visits paid to us; but, from prudential motives, and our love of domestic quiet, we uniformly refused all invitations to dinner.

On the 26th, I had a letter from the Under-secretary of State, to say, that the Germans had sailed in a store-ship for Jamaica, and that they would be lodged at Port Royal, agreeably to my suggestion, until one of my vessels could remove them to Seaward Islands; also, that her Majesty had ordered them to receive a suit of new clothing each, on their arrival at Jamaica, and 40s. in money, on embarking for their ultimate destination: and he was commanded to thank me, in the name of the King, for the handsome manner in which I had complied with the request of government respecting them. I was glad to receive this intimation; and, indeed, much pleased with the whole tenour of the communication,—at once so gratifying and flattering.

A letter from Mr. Perry announced that he had made a transfer of the stock, as proposed, and that it would turn out a very good thing. In reply to this letter, after thanking him, I requested him to open the iron chest, and put aside the gold sword-handles, and eight of the gold chains, the four silver salvers, the two beakers, and the candlesticks; and then to sell all the rest by weight to a goldsmith, and lay out the amount in elegant modern silver plate; or as much of the money as might be required to purchase the articles enumerated in a list made out by Lady Seaward, herewith transmitted; and to send the new plate, together with the Spanish things set apart, all properly packed in the iron chest, by wagon, directed to Mr. William Seaward, merchant, Bristol.

During the time of our being at Hartland, my dear wife and myself held many anxious conferences on the subject of Seaward Islands; taking into our consideration every place, and person, and circumstance, at different times; but since the arrival of the Secretary of State's letter, we had made our discussions quite a matter of business; and I now sat down to write the result of our deliberations by the March packet; bearing on my former instructions to my brother James and to Captain Drake, with some important additions calculated to insure the future comfort of the settlers, especially of the Germans: and I desired that the schooner might be in waiting for me at Kingston, on the second week in June; and to take in there, as quickly as possible, the things I had ordered, and be in readiness to sail when I might arrive.

The month of March passed away, without anything important occurring; during which we kept very much at home,—devoting ourselves to books, and the study of the French language; my dear Eliza amusing herself sometimes in arranging her beautiful shells, while I visited the gardener and his men at their work: so that our time passed pleasantly, and I had the satisfaction to see that the grounds and the garden would be left in very good order for my sisters. Some young wall-fruit, and other trees, were put into the ground early in the month; and I had the advantage of standing by, while the gardener performed the operation of budding, on others. This I treasured up in my memory, for the purpose of propagating any good sorts of shaddocks or oranges, that might appear among the various sowings at the islands. Sometimes we took a drive, to recreate my Eliza and myself; and sometimes my sisters took their ride, while we remained at home.

About the end of the month I received the iron chest, which had been sent to the care of my uncle, as directed. Besides the gold articles, and pieces of old Spanish plate, it contained two tankards, six pair of silver candlesticks, one very large, and two smaller waiters, two bread-baskets, four small waiters, two coffee-pots, two tea-pots, two sugar-basins, two cream-ewers, with a considerable number of table and tea-spoons, and silver-handled knives and forks, two soup-ladles, four gravy-spoons, two punch-ladles, with a doubloon as a bottom to each, as had been directed, eight salt-cellars, two mustard-pots, eight butter-boats, sugar and pepper-boxes, salt-spoons, sugar-tongs, and some other trifling articles; the whole of which cost 657*l.*, being not quite one-half of what the gold and silver articles sold for. Mr. Perry sent me the particulars of the sale, which amounted to 1342*l.*; so that after paying for the plate, it left a balance to my credit of 685*l.*

The ladies soon decorated the sideboard, and the tea-table was made resplendent with silver equipage. I was called upon the next day, when our good father-in-law dined with us, to let one of the splendid tankards go round; and after dinner, the King of Spain's head was seen smiling from the bottom of the punch-bowl.

I was so well pleased with Mr. Perry, when I considered the many essential services he had rendered me, and the quiet way in which he had performed them, that I wrote to the silversmith who had made my things, and sent him four doubloons, desiring him to make two richly embossed silver tankards, of the value of 100*l.*, and put a doubloon on the cover, and one in the front, of each; and to engrave on the bottom—"A small tribute of esteem, from Sir Edward Seaward to Thomas Perry, Esquire, 1737;" and to send them, when done, to that gentleman, with my respects. My dear wife highly approved of this act of gratitude, which his excellent conduct and eminent services amply deserved. About the middle of April I received a letter from Mr. Perry, acknowledging the receipt of the tankard; which, he said, he should value for the sake of the donor; but that I had taken care those who might come after him should value them for their own sake, for they were really superb. I got a banker's bill from Bristol for the 100*l.*, which I enclosed to Mr. Harding, that the order for the payment might not be presented at Mr. Perry's bank.

It was on the 14th of April, I sent the bank-bill from Bristol; my dear wife, with my sister Maria, having accompanied me there, to order some suitable clothing for ourselves, together with low-heeled boots and shoes, and some new articles of furniture, besides an outfit of glass, and china, and crockeryware, damask linen, and cutlery, grocery, and some other articles we might require at our trans-Atlantic home; to be packed, and in readiness, for our departure. I then engaged the whole cabin and state-rooms of the Hero, for 300*l.*; and after passing rather a busy week, in which we contrived to dine one day with General Grenfield, we returned to Hartland.

My dear Mr. Goldsmith had been indefatigable in his inquiries for a clergyman to go out with us; and at last he met with a married gentleman, having two children, girls; one three, and the other five years old. He had been recommended to go to a warm climate, on account of delicate lungs; which, for some time, had prevented his performing the arduous duties of a curate: but his finances were too low to enable him to profit by the advice; he therefore eagerly caught at our proposal; and so glad was he to go with us, that he insisted on not accepting any stipend whatever,—at least, not until after we should see how his health might turn out, after his arrival. My good father-in-law introduced the Rev. Mr. Rowley, and his family, to us, on Sunday, the 17th, a few days after our return from Bristol. I liked his appearance and his manner; which, being much subdued, either by religion or want of health, stamped on him that air of meekness which seems the distinctive mark of a true Christian. My dear wife was much pleased with Mrs. Rowley and her engaging children, and we requested them to take up their abode with us, until we all should leave Gloucestershire together to embark for the West Indies; which we had reason to believe would take place in about ten days. They, however, remained at the parsonage all night, and in the morning our carriage was sent for them, to take up their residence with us.

In talking to Mr. Rowley one day about our dear little islands, I made some allusion to the Germans lately gone out to Jamaica in a government storeship, on their way to find a settlement and a home among us. "How came it to pass," said he, "that those people were sent to the West Indies at all?"—"They were to have gone to Georgia," I replied; "but having missed their passage, the Queen placed them under the protection of Lady Seaward. They are sent out before us: and I hope they shall have little reason to regret the event; especially as they will now have the advantage of your ministry, in addition to what we may be able to do for them. But this reminds me," continued I, "of having heard a good deal in London, from a Mr. Powis, about a reverend gentleman lately set out to where they were to have gone:—I think his name is Wesley. In speaking of him, Mr. Powis called him a cracked-brained enthusiast; relating a number of strange things he had done and said; and that, to complete all, he had gone out to Georgia, to convert the Indians. But Mr. Powis hinted, that Mr. Wesley had secret expectations of being ultimately made bishop of the province. Do you know anything of him?"—"I remember," said Mr. Rowley, "to have seen Mr. John Wesley, when at Oxford, about seven years ago; his conduct and opinions there, certainly occasioned some conversation, and discussion among the men; but I knew very little of him personally: I think, however, it is likely he will be highly useful in Georgia; for, whatever, his peculiar views may be, his piety is unimpeachable. I never can forget," continued my visitor, "an expression of Mr. Gerard, the Bishop's chaplain, respecting him, when George Lascelles was launching out against the curator of the Holy Club. 'Whatever eccentricities John Wesley may have,' said the chaplain, 'I mistake much if he will not one day be standard-bearer of the Cross, whether in his own country or beyond the seas.' Now, Sir Edward," continued Mr. Rowley, "I take

Mr. Gerard to have had as good a light in this matter, as the Jesuit Le Jay had, when he said to his pupil Voltaire, 'Young man, the day will arrive, when you will be the standard-bearer of Infidelity.' This prophecy of Le Jay is fulfilled, I think; and I firmly believe so will be that of Gerard. Le Jay saw in his pupil the most unrestrained scepticism and impiety—Gerard observed in Wesley a holy zeal burning within him, then restrained, but ready to burst into a flame."

The time for our departure was now drawing nigh, so that I thought it quite time to come to final arrangements with my kind and worthy father-in-law, with respect to the management of my affairs at home; and he came over to Hartland for the purpose. "Now, my dear friend," said I, "you will promise to comply with all I desire you to do."—He said, "I will."—"Then," I resumed, "you are to receive the rents of the estate half-yearly; out of which half-yearly rents, you are to pay my sisters 100*l.*, and you are to pay yourself 100*l.*"—"For what?" he said, interrupting me.—"For your services," I replied; "or if you demur at the principle I have chosen, accept it because by so doing you will make Eliza and myself happy, and we can well afford it." After hesitating a moment, he said—"200*l.* a year, in addition to what I have, is too much for me: half of it is enough."—"Then give your daughters the other half, if you please, my dear and esteemed Mr. Goldsmith; but I must insist on your taking it, as you promised to comply with all I should desire."—"Thank you, my dear son," he replied; "I will not refuse it; as I perceive you are in earnest, that I should accede to your kind provision for my dear family."—"Out of which, my dear friend," I replied, "I have received the rarest jewel the sun ever shone upon. But now," I resumed,

“there are one or two things more: let twelve cottages be built, at a cost of 20*l.* each; to which, attach three acres of good land, in suitable but in distant situations on the estate; and as they are finished, give them to poor industrious families, rent free the first year; but afterwards, at a rent from 1*l.* to 4*l.*, according as you can find they can afford to pay. And now, dear instructor of my youth, and father of my Eliza,” continued I, “I request you to distribute, in her name, the sum of 50*l.* annually, in such sums and at such times as opportunities may present themselves, for relieving the distresses of the poor in and about Awbury and Hartland.”—“I will do it,” he replied; “and God will bless you; and the poor will bless the name of my child, and the hand of her father, commissioned to relieve them.”

During the week, my dear wife and her sisters, and Rosalie, were busied packing; and such of the plate as we thought we might require, was also put up: the key of the iron chest, in which three fourths of it remained, was then given to my elder sister. The heavy trunks and packages, being completed, we sent them off to Bristol, with a letter to my uncle, requesting him to lay in our sea-stores, and to purchase poultry and other fresh stock for the voyage.

On Sunday, the 24th, we as usual went to church at Awbury: in our walk, we had the pleasure to see the venerable elm, so endeared from our infancy, in full foliage; and it now reminded us of our magnificent and not less dear silk-cotton tree, under whose hospitable shade so many happy and memorable events had taken place. After service to day, my Eliza distributed five guineas among the poor of the village.

On Monday, she and myself entered into detail with my two elder sisters, respecting the management of Hartland, in our absence. After our departure, all the servants were to be discharged, excepting the gardener and his wife, the cook, and one housemaid; and I then told my sisters that Mr. Goldsmith would pay them 100*l.* every six months, with which they were to support themselves and the house. But I now gave them 100*l.* down; and told them he would begin his payments next Michaelmas; and that, as there were two good fields attached to the mansion, besides the orchard, I wished them to purchase a couple of cows and a pillion horse. The gardener's wife would take care of the cows; and the gardener could ride before the one or the other to church, when the weather would not permit them to walk there together. They were quite satisfied with my arrangement; but hoped we would not stay long away from England. On the same day, I sent forward some more things, and a couple of heavy trunks, belonging to the Rev. Mr. Rowley, accompanied by a letter to the landlord of the Tolzey, to say how many bedrooms we should want, and when he might expect us.

I had now thought it right to apprise my noble and kind friend, Lord Harrington, of my speedy departure from England, for Seaward Islands, and ventured to request a letter of introduction to the Governor of Jamaica. In conclusion, I thanked him for all his courtesies and kindnesses; and I subjoined my address at Bristol, from whence, I said, I expected to sail in a few days.

The following morning, we contrived to pack my sister Maria into our carriage, with the whole of the clergyman's family, and sent them forward. On Thursday, the 28th, dear Mr. Goldsmith and his daughters came over to Hartland; and after taking a most affectionate farewell of them and my own sisters, Eliza and myself, accompanied by Rosalie, and our faithful little dog, took our places in the carriage (which had previously returned from Bristol), and left our dearest friends, and our comfortable home, to pursue the line of perhaps perilous duty, which we believed our heavenly Father required at our hands.

On our arrival at the inn, my uncle was there to receive us: he told me the ship was ready, and all things on board, and that she would drop down to King Road tomorrow. My dear wife instantly went out to purchase such matters as Rosalie or my sister might want, accompanied by Mrs. Rowley; who bought low-heeled shoes and boots, and other articles of clothing which my Eliza pointed out to her as useful.

While they were thus engaged, I lost no time in paying my uncle for the provisions he had sent out in the Mary, to meet the wants of the Germans; and every other his disbursements on my account. I then paid my passage-money to Captain Henderson, for the great cabin of the Hero; and wrote off to my bankers in London, for a statement of my account with them. I was anxious for a reply to this letter, but scarcely could expect it before we sailed. It, however, made its appearance on Monday forenoon, just as we were about to set off for embarkation; and right glad I was to see it, and to find a balance in my favour of between 4000*l.* and 5000*l.* viz. 4503*l.* 13*s.* 6*d.*, after being debited 1475*l.*, the amount of bills drawn since I left London, independent of the purchase-money for Hartland.

On Saturday, I had the pleasure to receive a kind letter from Lord Harrington, enclosing a private letter of introduction, under a flying seal, to Mr. Trelawney, who had been just appointed Governor of Jamaica. This mode of affixing his seal, gave me an opportunity of seeing the handsome manner he had spoken of me to his Excellency. All things were now ready, and the ship at King Road only waiting for a wind; but we were sadly afraid she might sail on the morrow, which would be Sunday; the wind, however, did not come round till the day following. Then, all was bustle: my letter from the bankers fortunately arrived amidst it all; my uncle and aunt being at the inn, to take leave of us. We were now summoned; and after a cordial embrace from each, and some tears from the old lady, which my sweet Eliza's eyes answered, we hurried off in two hired carriages; our own being sent back to Hartland, to be put up in the coach-house; and within an hour arrived at Lamplighter's Hall, an inn pleasantly situated near the embouchure of the river Avon; and there embarking in a fine boat that was in readiness for us, we reached the ship in a short time, and got safely on board. It was nearly high water; the wind was fair and fresh, the topsails sheeted home, and the anchor a-peak. In half an hour more, we were under sail standing down Channel, with every prospect of fine weather.

CHAPTER IV.

MONDAY, 2d of May, 1737.—It was some time before the hurry of our spirits subsided. As evening came on, my dear Eliza and myself drew off from our companions, towards the stern of the vessel, and there stood silently together, looking somewhat vacantly on the receding shore. A deep sigh from the bosom of my beloved, awakened my attention: the image of her inestimable parent was passing across her mind, and the big tear trickled down her cheek; then, as if awaking from her reverie, she took my hand, saying,—“ But you are with me! and the true and faithful One has said, ‘ Lo! I am with you, even to the end of the world!’ and he never has forsaken us.” The appeal was balm to my heart; for even I was somewhat troubled at leaving England. She was thinking only of the friends she had left behind; I was considering the dangers into which I perhaps was about to plunge her and myself; and I had begun to repent that I had quitted a retreat, in which, with my ample fortune, we might have enjoyed comparative safety, and every comfort this world’s goods can bestow. The selfish principle was in full operation, so that I was neither thinking of my duty to God, nor my neighbour, when she made the seasonable appeal to my better feelings. “ And thou art with me, dearest,” I replied; “ and our God will never leave us, nor forsake us, although I feel I am most unworthy.” I told her what had been passing in my mind, which she allowed to be nothing more than natural feeling; adding that, through the influence of divine grace, I soon would be again alive to the duties I was called upon to perform; and that our heavenly Father would sweeten those duties, by his approval and his presence, as heretofore, to our supreme and abiding delight; and compared with which, all other pleasures were but fleeting and joyless shadows.

Although the weather continued fine and the wind fair, the parson and his wife soon became sea-sick; Rosalie was sick also; but the two little girls, and my sister, ate and drank, and ran about cleverly. The Hero was a fine ship, with a poop, and a noble cabin, so that we had the most comfortable accommodation that could be desired. The wind continued fair for a week; we then had rain, and westerly winds for a day or two, and some unpleasant weather: but it again became fine, and our invalids gradually recovered their sea legs and their appetite; so that they walked the deck when it was fair, and enjoyed a good dinner every day when the dinner hour came: indeed, they who had been sea-sick, made up for lee-way; their appetites being proportionally greater than ours. We had prayers in the cabin on Sunday; and on Thursday, the 12th, the ship anchored at Madeira, in Funchall Roads.

A few bales of merchandise were to be landed here, and but a few pipes of wine to be taken in. We therefore hastened to go on shore, and visit the place, as our time would be short. The town, being built of white houses and on an acclivity, with several convents and churches raising their belfries and domes majestically above the other buildings, had an imposing appearance from the bay: and this effect was much enhanced by the magnificence of the background, hills of high elevation, decorated with vineyards and lemon groves, and here and there beautified by a noble convent or a church. But, on going on shore, we found the town mean and dirty; and even the convents and churches fell far short of that elegance which their appearance at a distance had led us to expect. The day was hot, and the roads dusty; the place swarming with priests, and friars, and beggars: the priests wore black cassocks and hats. There were Franciscan friars, in black; and Dominican friars, in white, with red crosses on the breast: there were Capuchins, in coarse brown woollen; but all were tonsured and bare-headed. The beggars were dirty, and lousy, and lazy; and there was nothing beyond the novelty of the scene to entertain us. We went into a church; and certainly the first impression was imposing, — the grandeur of its columns, its marble pavement, and the brilliancy of its decorations: there were many women on their knees, dressed in black, each with a rosary in her hand. Several priests and friars were officiating at the altar, on which two colossal candles stood: a little bell frequently rang; and as often, one of the priests courtesied, or rather bobbed, before the altar, on which stood a representation of the Passion on Calvary. As the priest bobbed, the people crossed themselves: this was repeated many times while we remained. But Mr. Rowley, getting out of all patience at such mummery and prostitution of our blessed and spiritual religion, urged us to go; and accordingly we left the place.

In a few hours afterwards I met Captain Henderson, and accompanied him to the wine vaults, where his wine was filling: I here tasted some of the best white wine I had ever met with, and contrived to persuade the merchant to let me have two pipes of what he called the "Doctor;" being of a superior quality, and kept for improving ordinary wines; for which I paid him the large sum of 20*l.* sterling each. But, indeed, all his wines for exportation, which he called "Particular," were very far superior to the best wine sold under the name of Canary.

The next day we weighed anchor, and proceeded on our voyage. In eight or nine days more we got into the trade winds blowing from east. It was now, indeed, quite delightful; the weather so comfortably warm; the wind so cooling and pleasant; the sea so smooth; and the ship, with all her canvass spread, going along with the wind on the quarter, steadily yet swiftly. In the evening we all sat on the poop, and listened to Rosalie singing to her guitar. The sun went down, as we were thus delightfully engaged, in unclouded majesty, decorating the horizon with all the hues and brilliancy of variegated and burnished gold.

On Sabbath days, Mr. Rowley read prayers on the quarter-deck, and delivered a short but impressive sermon: the crew appeared serious on these occasions; and the weather being fine, and the breeze steady, nothing occurred at any time to disturb the solemnity of the meeting.

On Sunday, the 5th of June, we made the island of Antigua; and passed near enough to see its fine hills and valleys, and rich plantations. The sight of this island brought to our recollection the narrow escape the white population had last October, when that most formidable and well-concerted villanous plan was laid for blowing up all the principal people, at the Government House, where a ball was to be given in celebration of his Majesty's coronation. But the Governor's son having died at St. Kitt's, that event caused the rejoicings to be put off; and the plot being happily discovered, many of the conspirator negroes were, alas! put to the torture; on which one of them confessed, how that when the Government House should appear in flames, the whites in the town were to be attacked by negroes, armed with cutlasses, from three different points; and men, women, and children put to the sword; while, at the same moment, all the negroes on the estates, were to rise and murder the whites throughout the island. The Judge of all men hath spared you this time, good people of Antigua!—Spare your slaves; remember they are your brethren, though in bondage; that they may not again seek revenge in the blood of their oppressors. Be their masters, not their tyrants.

Our course from Antigua was nearly before the wind; which occasioned the ship to roll so much, although the sea was quite smooth, that it was impossible to walk the deck in any safety. The ladies were glad to put on their low-heeled shoes, and chalk them: but even with these precautions, they got an awkward lurch now and then (as the sailors term it), and sometimes an upset, so that they were glad to sit down in some secure place, whenever they ventured out of the cabin; and even there it was necessary to place covered ropes fore and aft, to prevent their falling.

On Monday, the 13th of June, we made the east end of Jamaica; hailing again, with pleasure, the sight of those stupendous mountains we had beheld with so much admiration on our former voyage. In the evening we were becalmed off the upper White Horses; but about seven o'clock the following morning the sea-breeze reached us, which carried us round Port Royal Point, and brought us to an anchor off Kingston at two o'clock in the afternoon.

We had been visited by the men-of-war's guard-boat, and by the intelligence-canoe from Kingston, before we entered the harbour; so that it was known at the town what we were, before the ship anchored. My dear friend Drake was the first to come on board; and so glad was I to see him, that I could scarcely withhold the impulse of throwing my arms around him. I, however, greeted him with all the demonstrations of gladness permitted to an Englishman: I shook him cordially by both his hands; my Eliza did the same; and I then introduced him to the Rev. Mr. Rowley and his wife, and to my sister: but Martin and Purdy, and the New England blacks, who were in the boat, and without ceremony had sprung on deck; now making a party in the interview, embraced my knees, and, falling on the deck, kissed the feet of their mistress. We bent to them, and raised them, and spoke kindly to them; inquiring after their wives, and their welfare. They had all a great deal to say, and each in his own way. Purdy was the same honest, funny fellow as ever: he said, his wife had brought him a boy "bigger than Drake's Head."—"Do you mean the promontory?" asked my dear wife, smiling.—"Oh, no, lady ma'am," replied Purdy; "I only mean the Captain's head, there;" and having had his joke, he skipped off into the boat; and the others followed, after making many bows, and giving vent to their expressions of joyous welcome.

Mr. Rowley turned to me—"These are some of your people, Sir Edward: the King might envy you: it is delightful to see such love between the negro and his lord: why is it not so everywhere?"—"Because," I replied, "I am not their lord. I teach them, as you will teach them, that God is their Lord; and I only his servant, though their benefactor." There was some bustle upon deck at this time, clueing up the sails, which induced Captain Drake to take the ladies into the cabin; and our short dialogue being finished, we quickly followed them. After this I took Drake aside, and had some engaging conversation with him; during which, I found that the Germans were safely arrived, and were now locating themselves on George's Island; that my instructions had been punctually obeyed in all things: the guns were got, and mounted; but, by some inadvertency, the ammunition had not been received from the Ordnance, for want of my receipt, which was specified in the order. "Go on shore, my good fellow," said I, "and take Mrs. White's house for us for a week, where I lodged before; and if you cannot get it, ask her to recommend you to some other: we will remain where we are until you return." Captain Drake came back in half an hour, with the agreeable intelligence that the brown lady's house was unoccupied, and that he had taken it. Dinner having been provided on board, and the sails being furled, I thought it might be just as well to dine on board, and remain until the cool of the evening. We were just going to sit down, as Drake returned: he joined us at table; whence we were in no great hurry to remove; but sat over our wine, and some fine fruit that had been brought on board, to a late hour in the afternoon. We then all disembarked; our boat's crew, meanwhile, having been employed in taking our light trunks, and some other things, on shore to the lodgings.

Our hostess was very glad to see us again, making many fine speeches to my wife; but when she heard Mrs. Rowley address her as her Ladyship, she cried—"High! these buccara scome back very grand, for true. I very glad, ma'am, to hear somebody call you Ladyship: you go now to Governor's ball!" So much for Mrs. White, who was as brown as gingerbread. I laughed at the naïveté of our hostess; and my dear sister Maria, with the eagerness of curiosity, inquired of her when the Governor's ball was to be given: but there was no ball; it was nothing more than a phrase usual at Jamaica, signifying, "You are now above common people." Every thing around us appeared strange to the new comers; but more especially the negro population: however, our dear friends soon felt quite at their ease; the kindness and assiduity of our hostess leaving no cause for complaint. She was quite delighted to see poor Fidele again; and the dear little dog seemed to remember her. There was a room for us; one for the clergyman's family; and one for my sister and Rosalie, who had been bedfellows ever since we left England, and were much attached.

Next morning, I desired Drake to equip himself in his best attire, and hire a kittereen, — a sort of one-horse chaise,—and go to Spanish Town with a despatch for the Governor. I therein enclosed the letter from Lord Harrington, and also the letter to Mrs. Trelawney, which my wife brought from Mrs. Grenfield; saying, I should be happy if his Excellency would appoint an early day for me to pay my respects to him, as I intended to leave Jamaica for Seaward Islands, on Tuesday next. In giving the packet to Drake, I said—"If the Governor should ask you what you are,—as I have put 'By Captain Drake' on the cover,—tell him you command my yacht; and if you have any scruple about that answer," continued I, smiling, "you shall have your commission before you go; for I have authority to grant it; and if I don't do it now, I will do it before we sail."—"Thank you, sir," said Drake; "I'll look well up, on the strength of it."

After he was gone I had a visit from Mr. Green, who complimented me on the honours I had received in England, and said he had been happy in executing punctually the commissions intrusted to him. I was sorry to learn from him that there was at the present time a good deal of sickness in the island, and that the small-pox, notwithstanding the late introduction of inoculation, (for which, if I mistake not, we are so much indebted to that clever Lady Mary W. Montagu,) had been very destructive among the negroes. On hearing this account, I felt grateful to God that our little colony had enjoyed, if not uninterrupted health, at least an exemption from any epidemical scourge. Before he left me, I settled his accounts for lumber and the other supplies.

Resolved to give my English friends a treat, I desired our hostess to provide us a turtle dinner; to which I invited the captain of the Hero. The brown lady sent up her turtle dressed in various ways, but each was excellent. We all agreed in commending the aldermanic taste, as we did justice to the feast. Captain Henderson made himself particularly agreeable on the occasion; exhibiting a vein of pleasantry and mirth he had not thought fit to open on shipboard. The day was altogether pleasant and recreating: and just before our guest took his leave, I told him I did not mean to act shabbily towards him, but, as I had another voyage, although a short one, instantly to perform, I stood in need of our stock and poultry left on board the Hero; and as they were there, I would not think of purchasing any other, but would make him a compensation in money, if he desired it. "Certainly not," he replied; "I lived at your table all the way out; you paid me handsomely for the cabin: do not leave a feather; I do not expect it." This was generous, and I took him at his word; feeling that it was but right. Next morning, Martin was ordered to remove two sheep, and some fine fowls, from the Hero into the schooner.

Just as we were thinking of retiring to rest, Drake made his appearance. He brought a letter for me, and another for Lady Seaward. "Well, Drake," said I, before I broke the seal, "what sort of a reception had you?"—"The Governor was truly kind to me, indeed, sir," he replied: "he instantly desired me to stay and dine with him; saying, I might take the answers to your packet after dinner."—"Well, that was civil indeed!" said I. I now opened the Governor's letter, in which he expressed his earnest wish to see us at the Government House as soon as possible; and as he understood from Captain Drake that I had no carriage with me, he would send us his own, as soon as he knew when he might expect the honour of our visit. Mrs. Trelawney's letter to my wife was to the same effect. Drake told us the Governor asked a thousand questions about the settlement; and it was a long time before he could be made to comprehend where it was: he had never heard of it before. "Nor Governor Ascough," I replied, "I dare say, who signed my commission." It was now quite time to go to bed; so I made our friend take some weak brandy and water, in haste, saying—"When we go to St. George's Island, I won't put you off this way; we will then have a cigar together: but I have not smoked since we last met."

Early next day I sent off a messenger with letters to Government House; in which I said we would avail ourselves of the Governor's carriage, and requested to have it before daylight the following morning, so as to arrive at Spanish Town before the heat of the day: the distance being only thirteen miles, I knew we could do it very well before breakfast. Drake came to me just as the messenger left me: I then gave him instructions to get our heavy trunks, and packages of furniture, and supplies, also the two pipes of Madeira wine, out of the Hero into the schooner; and to drop down to the Ordnance wharf in the Lagoon, where he was to present my receipt, and there take in 500 cannon shot, and twelve barrels of gunpowder. "After you return," said I, "you are to make my lodgings your home; where I expect you will render every assistance in your power to the parson, and to the ladies, during our absence."

The Governor's carriage was at the door, a little after daylight on Friday morning. My dear wife and myself stepped in, followed by Rosalie, a trunk, a wig-box, and a bandbox. Our postilion was black as jet; and there were two negro footmen behind, not very elegant in their apparel: however, we got on at a good pace; arriving at Spanish Town in about an hour and a half. Mr. and Mrs. Trelawney and Secretary were in the breakfast-room, ready to receive us. There was no ceremony, but the proffered hand, with "We are very glad to see you; we hope you had a pleasant ride; the morning has been delightfully cool." Our reply was in unison with our reception:—"We enjoyed our drive very much: we are indebted to you, for so kindly sending your carriage for us." Breakfast was soon brought in; during which we conversed on light and trivial subjects. After it was over, the Secretary left us: the Governor and myself, retiring to a balcony on the west side of the house, walked in the shade, conversing on matters of business.

We touched slightly on the subject of the commission I had received two years ago: I then gave him an outline of the circumstances which had taken me to the islands, and brought them under the notice of the Crown; I pointed out the importance of their situation, in the event of a Spanish war, and related to him my conversation with General Grenfield. He replied, it was most extraordinary that the place had not been seized long ago, either by us or by the Spaniards. I told him, it was not at all extraordinary; for it was so beset with shoals and reefs, for thirty or forty miles round, in almost every direction, that unless a local knowledge had been first acquired, by accident or otherwise, by honest-going seamen, every vessel, on perceiving the breakers, would haul out of the way, and never have a chance of seeing, much less of making their way to the islands. We then talked a good deal about his Majesty's escape, near Helvoetsluys; of the marriage of the Prince of Wales; of the coolness between him and the King; of the excellency of the Queen's government during the absence of his Majesty; of Sir Robert Walpole; of the haughty and unprincipled conduct of Spain; and various other topics of high and general interest. He then made many observations about the Maroons, their daring conduct, and the great difficulty he would have in bringing them into subjection; hinting, at the same time, that I might serve him essentially, if I could procure about 200 Indians from the Mosquito shore, to assist in hunting them down. I replied, that as yet I was a perfect stranger to the Mosquito Indians; but, if he would give me written instructions, I would send Captain Drake, in my schooner, to carry them into effect; and I was sure he would do it, if practicable. "Drake is a fine fellow," said I: "he served his time in the navy for lieutenant, but has not obtained promotion: he has been in my service nearly two years, and never made a difficulty in any business on which I have had occasion to employ him."—"That's the sort of spirit I like," said Mr. Trelawney. "We will talk this matter over by-and-by, in detail; and, if agreeable to you, I should wish to see Mr. Drake again before you sail. I was much pleased with him," continued the Governor, "the day he dined here: he spoke of you in a way that gave me a very favourable opinion of his gratitude, yet manly independence."

"I'll tell you what, Sir Edward," resumed Mr. Trelawney, after some pause; "you stand well with the ministry: they will not refuse you a small favour. It is come into my mind, that we can prevail on the Commander-in-Chief here, to take your yacht in on the list of the navy, and give an order to Mr. Drake to act as lieutenant in command of her. If we can accomplish this, your interest at home can very easily get the act confirmed. It will serve him, and it will save you a vast expense; the vessel will be refitted at the dock-yard here, and stores allowed, and Mr. Drake will have lieutenant's pay." I thanked him most sincerely for the suggestion; which appeared to me of such importance, that I said I should like to set about it immediately. He agreed to my proposition; and we walked directly from the balcony to the library. He there instantly sat down, and wrote a letter to the Commodore. "Now," said he, "if you have no objection, copy that, with any alterations you please; sign it, and direct it: and I will write another from myself to the same effect; and we shall see what can be done." These letters set forth the advantage that would accrue to his Majesty's service, by commissioning the yacht employed by the Governor of Seaward Islands; and recommending Mr. Francis Drake to command her, who had served the required time in the navy for a commission as lieutenant; the projected service on the Mosquito shore being introduced as a special reason for the request. These letters were then sealed, and sent off to the Commodore. In the evening, a short but friendly reply was received from Commodore Gunman, saying, he would come to Government House to-morrow, and talk over the business, for he was at a loss how to act. He did not wish to disoblige the Governor of Jamaica; but he was rather afraid to comply with the request.

But to return: after the letters were despatched to the Admiral, Mr. Trelawney entered fully on the subject of Spanish depredations; and expressed a wish that I would keep a look out on the Spaniards, and get all the information I could. Then, adverting to something Sir Robert Walpole had said, about the probability of employing me on some service on the Spanish Main, he thought it might be well for me by-and-by to visit Santa Martha, and some other of the principal places: and he hoped I would keep up a regular communication with him on all these subjects; adding, that he would state these views in his first despatches to England. So he was certain, that his representations and my own interest must secure the object in hand respecting the yacht: indeed, he thought government would purchase the vessel, if I chose to ask it. But I immediately rejected this idea, saying, I should be too glad to accomplish the arrangements proposed, without asking anything more.

We joined the ladies a little after noontide. My dear wife had charmed Mrs. Trelawney not a little: they had talked much of Mrs. Grenfield; and, with a pardonable vanity, my Eliza had shown her the Queen's letters. Immediately on our going into the saloon where they were, Mrs. Trelawney said—"My dear Lady Seaward, you must show my husband the letters of our most excellent Queen; she is a divine woman." My dear wife, without any hesitation, put them into Mrs. Trelawney's hand, who gave them to the Governor. He read them, without any comment, and presented them to their owner, saying—"Your Ladyship may be justly proud of the friendship of her Majesty:" then turning to me, he said—"You have not told me anything about these Germans." I then related the business to him from beginning to end: on which he remarked, that there was negligence somewhere; for that he was not informed of their having been at Port Royal.

We now retired to lounge away an hour in the heat of the day in our bed-room, and to dress for dinner. My dear wife and myself then talked over the heads of our conversations with the Governor and his wife; and it delighted her to hear that Drake was likely to get a commission as lieutenant in the navy, and our schooner to be made a King's vessel. I then went into an adjoining apartment to change my dress, having had on my plain suit in the morning, but I now put on my embroidered velvet. Rosalie was in attendance to assist her mistress, who dressed in the white satin, with hat and feathers, and pearls, just as when she paid her first respects to the Queen.

On coming into the drawing-room, Mr. and Mrs. Trelawney, Doctor Kane, and the Secretary, were already there; and soon after, Colonel and Mrs. Wilkinson, and Sir Charles and Lady Price, were announced. These people were all remarkably well bred, courteous, and free from untravelled stiffness, and all ill-concerted ceremony. We therefore conversed with every one by turns in the most unrestrained and agreeable manner; and I could not but envy the elegant manners of Sir Charles Price, who by his affability and great information raised himself high in my estimation. The dinner was neat, but not sumptuous, the wines excellent, and the conversation highly instructive, lively, and agreeable. Coffee was served early, followed by liqueurs. During the evening's conversation, Sir Charles and Lady Price invited us to visit them at the Decoy, a fine and beautifully ornamented estate on the northern side of the island; but we could not make a promise to do so. Between eight and nine o'clock the company took their leave.

After they were gone, the Governor opened the Commodore's note, which he read to me. "Now," said he,

"I will not ask any one to dinner to-morrow. The old boy hates a large party, which he designates a mob: so we will sit down as we are; and, by being alone, there will be a fair opportunity to talk him over, if it should be required."

Early the next morning, Mrs. Trelawney took my wife and Rosalie out in the carriage, to enjoy the cool air, and make a little excursion into the country along the banks of the Rio Cobre. Mrs. Trelawney had heard Rosalie's history from Lady Seaward; and being a good French scholar, took much delight in conversing with her; the fashions in Paris, and London, forming no small part of their chit-chat during the ride.

The Commodore arrived about one o'clock, accompanied by his secretary, who, it seems, lives with him at a pen, allowed by the Island of Jamaica for his shore residence. Mr. Trelawney introduced me to him. "I am very glad to see you, Sir Edward Seaward," said he, "but I fear you want to get me into a scrape with the Admiralty."—"That is far from my wish, sir," I replied; "if you and the Governor of Jamaica do not think the measure called for, necessary for the good of his Majesty's service, I should not deserve his Majesty's commission and confidence, were I to urge it."—"Why did you not apply to the Admiralty," said he, "before you left England? then I should not have been placed in a cleft stick, between their Lordships and my friend the Governor here." To use a seaman's phrase, I was taken rather aback by this unexpected question. Mr. Trelawney looked at me, and I looked at the Commodore. "I am surprised, sir," said I at last, "that you could suppose I would forget myself so much, as to put such a slight upon the Commander-in-Chief on this station, even if I had contemplated the measure before I left England.

But the truth is, that the necessity of it has only become apparent to his Excellency and myself since we have had some conversation here on our relations with the Spaniards, and the part I may be called upon to act after my return to Seaward Islands.”—“Well then, gentlemen,” he replied, “we will adjourn to the library, and put this business in an official form; and I will see what can be done.” We accordingly retired; the Commodore taking with him his secretary. Our letters were then re-written, making the representations more full, and the request more pressing; and the Commodore being satisfied with them, promised to comply with their requests; at the same time desiring the secretary to make out an order for three of the captains of the squadron to examine Mr. Francis Drake, as touching his qualification for lieutenant; which order was made out instantly, and handed to me. “Now,” said the Commodore, “as soon as Mr. Drake passes his examination, I will give him an acting commission as lieutenant, with an order to hoist his pendant in the Porghee. Your yacht, which, you say, is a fine new Bermudian schooner, will then be taken into the service; a midshipman, and twelve men, and four guns, shall be allowed; but whether this will be ratified or annulled by the Admiralty, must depend entirely on the interest you, or your friend the Governor there, can make in England; he is a great favourite with Sir Charles Wager.”—“The measure requires no interest, to confirm it,” replied Mr. Trelawney; “it is of too much importance in its application, to want backing at home.”—“I lay you 5*l.*,” said the Commodore roundly, “if the measure is not well backed by influence at home, that I shall get a severe rap over the knuckles for the good of the service.”—“Well, well,” rejoined his Excellency, “don’t be uneasy on that score: Sir Edward Seaward has interest enough at court to make half a dozen post-captains, if it were required; therefore we need not be in doubt about his getting a poor dog of a lieutenant confirmed."—"I am afraid," said I, "your Excellency far overrates my influence; I will, however, hope it is sufficient for the present occasion."—"Ah! that's all we want now," replied the Commodore; "let him bottle up his interest for making post-captains, to another occasion. And now," resumed the old son of Neptune, "that our business is brought to a close, and I am half broiled by the sun in riding over here, I will thank you for a glass of sangaree, or sangarorum, if you please." Having said this, he shook up his waistcoat, to cool himself; adding, "By-and-by I will go and change my shirt, and cool my coat and waistcoat, and wig; and when I put them on again, I shall be dressed for dinner."

I lost no time in writing to Drake; telling him what had been accomplished, desiring him to take the earliest opportunity of thanking the Governor. I also enclosed the order directed to the three captains of the squadron, before whom he was to pass his examination; and expressed my great joy in making a communication to him so promising to his prospects. I directed him to get the thing gone through on Monday, if possible; and then wait on the Commodore's secretary with the certificate: on presenting which he would receive his commission, with instructions to take in guns and a crew for the schooner. I added, that Mr. Dilke, the present mate, should be borne as midshipman. And I requested he would immediately desire Mr. Finn to look out for another schooner, which must be purchased for my brother, and into which, for the present, we might turn over our own crew. I also bade him tell our friends, that this business most likely would detain us a week longer than

I had anticipated. I then despatched my letter; and joined my dear wife, who was dressing for dinner, and who was most happy to hear of all that I had done.

At dinner, the Commodore was remarkably gallant to the ladies. It appears that all sailors look up to women of virtue and good breeding as a kind of minor deities: there is nothing they would not do to please or gratify them. "You shall have a sloop of war," said he, to Lady Seaward, "to accompany you. I will send the Honourable Captain Townshend, Sir Robert Walpole's nephew, in the Shark, to escort you. You might, perhaps, find better accommodation in it than in Sir Edward's yacht: though, indeed, we are going to make a man-of-war of her." My dear wife thanked him with that sincerity which gives a sterling value to acknowledgments of kindness; but she said she would prefer going in the schooner—the accommodations being sufficiently good, and, as the navigation was extremely dangerous among the reefs, she should feel more safe.—"Indeed, sir," continued she, "if you would send the sloop of war merely to honour us, I feel I ought to endeavour to dissuade you from it, lest any accident might happen to it. But if you think it right to make some of your squadron acquainted with the place, there cannot be a better opportunity than the present; for I am sure, if your captain will follow in the track of the schooner, no danger can occur; and Sir Edward will take care that the pilot boat shall see him clear of all danger in returning."—"Well said, my little queen!" exclaimed the old boy; "the Shark shall be sent, then, on his Majesty's service; and you shall guarantee her safety."—"Against all negligence on our part," replied my wife.—"On our part!" re-echoed the Commodore; "now, I like that," continued he, "that's all one as a timber head in the ship;—you are well mated, Sir Edward!" The Commodore had said a good thing; so he laughed heartily, and enjoyed it.

Immediately after breakfast on the following day, which was Sunday, Commodore Gunman left us; and soon after his departure we went to church with the Governor and his family. There were few people there, excepting the military; with whom it was nearly filled. After church, Sir Charles and Lady Price called at Government House; and they again pressed us to visit the Decoy. In so hospitable and noble a manner was this invitation given and pressed upon us, that my dear wife thought it right to tell her Ladyship we would be most happy to accept it; but that the clergyman and his wife, who were going with us to Seaward Islands, together with a sister of her husband, were staying at Kingston waiting our return, which they were led now hourly to expect; but as circumstances had arisen that would delay us another fortnight, if Sir Charles and she would receive us all for a few days, we would be most happy to visit the Decoy. Lady Price in a moment met the proposal in the kindest manner, and said she would send a carriage for them. My Eliza fixed Tuesday morning, at daylight; and it was settled with Mrs. Trelawney that they should spend that day at Government House, and proceed the next morning. Sir Charles had a house in Spanish Town; to which he invited Mr. and Mrs. Trelawney and ourselves, to dine en famille the following day.

Letters were sent off on Monday morning to Mr. and Mrs. Rowley, and to my sister, informing them of our wish for them to join us at Spanish Town, and thence to pass a few days in the country with us, until we should be ready to sail. I also apprized them that Sir Charles Price's carriage would come for them at daylight the next morning. We had the honour this day to dine with the worthy Baronet. His dinner-table was magnificently arranged, with a complete service of silver-gilt plate. A fine full-length portrait of his Majesty hung at one end of the saloon; and every thing that hospitality and elegance could contribute, attended us while under his roof this day.

On Tuesday morning, our friends arrived to breakfast; and met with a kind and gracious reception from the Governor and his lady. Our first inquiry was about Drake. They had not brought any letter from him; but informed me he was to go to Greenwich this morning, to present himself before the passing captains. And he had desired Mr. Rowley to say, that, as soon as the thing was over, he would post off to Spanish Town, to pay his respects to Governor Trelawney and to myself. And sure enough, a little before the dinner-time, he made his appearance; and in his old midshipman's uniform, to our no small amusement. He came in with an honest smile on his face. "Your Excellency will excuse my being so badly rigged," said he, "but I thought it better to make sail as I was, and return you my best thanks for this commission, (taking it out of his pocket, and holding it in his hand,) which it has always been my proudest wish to attain; and now having got it, I hope I shall not disgrace it." I shook him warmly by the hand; and after Mr. Trelawney had paid him a suitable compliment, in return for what he had said, he cordially invited him to dinner. Drake begged to be excused; said, he must return immediately, having so much to do; but if he could speak to Sir Edward for half an hour, he should be happy during that time to take a biscuit and a glass of sangaree. We then had permission to retire; which opportunity Drake eagerly seized to take me by both my hands, and tell me how much he was overjoyed, how deeply he felt my kindness, and how proud the business altogether had made him feel. Some slices of cold ham and sangaree were brought in: I then desired him to occupy his mouth otherwise than in talking; and while he refreshed himself, I would sit down and write a string of memoranda for his guidance. I did this; and then took another sheet of paper, and drew out a set of bills of exchange on London for 100%. "Here, Drake," said I, "here are the memoranda, containing the outline of all I wish: you must fill up the detail yourself. But I am now desirous to pay a debt: here are the 100 dollars I promised you, when I left Jamaica for England: and do not marvel if you find every dollar a pound; for it is my pleasure to make it so." He took the papers—he looked at them—then at me—he then looked at them again; I saw his lip falter, and a tear come in his eye. He put them in his pocket, saying—"Thank you, sir!" at the same time holding out his hand, with which he grasped mine in a manner that spoke more eloquently than the tongue could speak: in fact, he was not able to speak. He then made his way out of the house, and departed without any more ceremony.

Sir Charles and Lady Price had gone to the Decoy; and our friends set off thither by daylight next morning, with letters from us. My dear wife remained with Mrs. Trelawney; but the Governor and myself went to Greenwich, to pay our respects to the Commodore at his pen. "I like our new lieutenant," said the old gentleman, as we entered; "he is a sailor every inch of him; and I have no doubt will make a good officer: I like his name, too," continued he; "another Sir Francis Drake belike, before he pops off; who knows?" We thanked the Commodore severally for his conduct in the affair; and

I told him I would immediately write letters to Sir Robert Walpole and to Lord Harrington; and Lady Seaward would write one to the Queen also, to request that the commission might be confirmed.—“That will clinch the business,” he replied: “her Majesty knows how to get the weather-gage of the Admiralty, if required.”

After breakfast, the Commodore told me he understood there were twelve barrels of gunpowder going in the Porghee from the Ordnance, for the use of a battery at Seaward Islands; adding, he would order the Shark to take the powder into her magazine; for it would be a dangerous shipmate stowed in the hold of any vessel. “But I hope,” continued he, “you will soon be ready, for I shall want the sloop of war back as quickly as possible. An officer will be sent in her, to make a survey of your reefs and islands, which I intend to transmit to the Admiralty.”—I assured him every possible despatch should be made, as far as depended on us; and that I would let him know by the end of the week on what day I could be ready.

As we were not far from Kingston, Mr. Trelawney was so kind as to comply with my wish to drive there, that I might see Mr. Drake, to make some new arrangements with him, in consequence of the Commodore’s anxiety that there should not be any delay in sailing. We got quietly to my lodging, without the Governor being recognised. It was then agreed we should dine here, and return to Spanish Town in the cool of the evening. As soon as I could get hold of Drake, I told him of the Commodore’s wish; and that, in consequence, the business of my brother’s schooner must be left for the present. I then proposed sailing with our own crew, and said he might come back with or without my brother, as he pleased; when he could turn over our crew to the new schooner, and get the Porghee properly fitted at the King's-yard, and take in the man-of-war's men and the guns. "I think, Sir Edward," returned he, "that will be our best plan; and in that case we can sail on Monday." I invited him to dine, but he said he had too much duty to do, so he took his leave, having come to an understanding that our departure was fixed for Monday morning; so I immediately sat down, and wrote a note to the Commodore to that effect.

Mrs. White soon discovered she had the honour of having the Governor of Jamaica in her house; and as she excelled in making a pepper-pot, to which his Excellency was known to be partial, she put forth her best efforts to deserve his commendations, and she received them. A little after sunset we got into the carriage, and reached Government House before nine o'clock. Mr. Trelawney entertained the ladies with an account of all our proceedings; among which was the brown lady's pepper-pot, with the great respect we paid to her and it.

On Thursday morning, we set off for the Decoy, in a light carriage belonging to the Governor, which he politely desired us to detain at the foot of the hills, in Sir Charles's keep, until our return, which was fixed for Saturday; at the same time requesting the whole party might dine at Government House, on our way back to Kingston. But this last kind request I was obliged to decline; stating, that we should wish to get home as soon as possible on Saturday, to complete our arrangements for sailing on Monday; that nothing might be left to be done on the Sabbath-day. The morning was cool, and the open carriage delightful. Rosalie was enchanted at her drive, and the many curious objects that presented themselves on the way. She had been quite idolized at Government House ; so that she could not help acknowledging how much happier she had been in Jamaica than ever she was in England : the people were so like the French ;—" point de tout taciturne et beaucoup de politesse." Our route was nearly north for about twelve or thirteen miles, through St. Thomas in the Vale, along or near the course of the Rio Cobre. We then quitted our carriage, and commenced the ascent of the mountain range, on mules and horses that were ready waiting our arrival ; attended by a numerous escort of servants, who carried our trunks and bandboxes on their heads, making altogether an extended line, which reminded us of the description of an Eastern caravan, winding its way along the steep sides of the Persian hills, in their progress from Bagdat to Samarcand, as we read in Arabian story-books. Having gained the summit of the hills, we descried the sea that bounds the island on the north, with a beautiful and highly cultivated valley lying between.

On our arrival at the Decoy, we were most hospitably received by its noble proprietor. Our dear friends, also, were most happy to meet us again ; for a few days of separation, in a strange land, appears an age. After resting, and dressing, and dining, we walked out, in the cool of the evening, to view the beautiful fountains and groves with which the taste and opulence of the possessor had decorated this delightful place. Sir Charles told me we were now at an elevation of 2000 feet above the level of the sea : that the Rio Nuevo takes its rise here, from the fine piece of water in front of his house ; a little Nubian lake : but, in truth, all around appeared more like some fabled residence of Genii than the actual residence of men—the varied avenues of tropical trees, intersected by arches, terminating in temples or in orange groves. The long lines of plantain walks, relieved by clumps of the ornamental cabbage palm—the fine piece of water—the clear blue sky—the cool atmosphere—the extended and beautiful landscape—the interminable ocean in the distance—altogether contributed to make an impression scarcely to be imagined, but never to be forgotten.

My dear wife and myself dedicated part of Friday to writing our letters to her Majesty, and to Sir Robert Walpole and Lord Harrington. She pleaded for the man who had conveyed the Germans to Seaward Islands; and who had been indefatigable in settling them comfortably there; a detail of which she soon hoped to have the honour of communicating: she even ventured to speak of his merits, and make an allusion to his illustrious name, but confessed that her only hope arose out of her Majesty's great kindness and favour. I took up the subject in a very different way, to the minister. The benefit that would result to his Majesty's service, the honour it would confer on myself, the facility it would afford me of carrying the Governor of Jamaica's wishes into execution with respect to the Mosquito Indians; and, moreover, the expediency of my vessel being enrolled with his Majesty's navy, and commanded by a King's officer, if I were to hold any official intercourse at any time with the governors or other officers belonging to Spain. And, finally, I requested, as a personal favour, that he would direct the Lords of the Admiralty to confirm Lieutenant Drake's commission: but to my Lord Harrington I only pleaded the wishes of a friend.

We remained at this enchanting spot until early on Saturday morning; when, yielding to my earnest representations, Sir Charles allowed us to depart; carrying along with us a deep impression of agreeable and grateful recollections. We then returned in the same manner that we came, merely resting ourselves and horses for a few hours at Spanish Town; but during this short stay at Government House, my dear wife and Mrs. Trelawney talked over all that was wonderful and delightful at the Decoy, while I profited by the opportunity to put into the Governor's hands the letters we had written there. On perusing them, he said, they would certainly accomplish the end in view; but that he would write also on the subject, and forward all the letters together: we then proceeded to Kingston, where we arrived late in the afternoon. I ordered the servants to put up the horses for the night, where they would have the best care taken of them; then, giving them money, dismissed them, with a kind message to their respective masters.

Drake soon joined us, with a satisfactory detail of all he had been doing; every thing was on board, and he had taken care to provide a large quantity of fine fruit. He had also duly paid his respects to Captain Townshend of the Shark, who was now at anchor off Port Royal, waiting to join us on Monday morning. Having little ourselves to do, we finished it in the course of the evening, and retired early to rest.

The following day, being the Sabbath, we all prepared to go to church. Drake appeared at the breakfast table in a new suit of lieutenant's uniform, attended by Martin and Purdy, and the two New England blacks, in white jackets and trousers. We congratulated our friend on the occasion; in which our faithful servants joined us, with a profusion of good wishes for their captain, and for their kind master, whom, they rejoiced to hear, King George had made Governor; "the same like Governor of Jamaica, and their good lady, Lady Governor too!"

We made a sort of procession to the church, there being eight of us, followed by Drake and his four men. Many of the people were more intent on looking at this novel sight, than at their Prayer-books; it being known to some who we were; and some strange and extravagant stories having been circulated respecting us, excited curiosity. There being no service at Kingston church in the afternoon, Mr. Rowley gave us prayers at home: and some of our men were present, the New Englanders having relieved John and Harry, the morning ship-keepers. Their new pastor was much pleased with their demeanour and attention on the occasion. After prayers, my dear wife and myself retired to our room, and wrote letters to Awbury and to Hartland, with an account of our safe arrival, and the pleasant manner in which we had passed our time at Jamaica; and that to-morrow we should sail for Seaward Islands.

We arose before daylight on Monday, and found our crew in readiness to take the trunks and boxes to the vessel. In their absence we had breakfast; and I then paid our hostess out of my bag of dollars I brought from London. The Porghee's boat not being large enough to stow us all comfortably at once, I requested Mr. and Mrs. Rowley to take their children, and go with Captain Drake, who had now come up to escort us, which they did. In half an hour he returned: then giving my sister Maria his arm, led the way. We followed, having Rosalie on one side, and our dear little Fidele on the other; and soon arrived at the place of embarkation. Here I stopped a moment, to speak to Mr. Green and Mr. Finn, who were waiting my coming: then stepping into the boat, where my companions were already seated, we rowed off towards the schooner.

She had been recently painted; her colours were hoisted, and the pendant, incident to her having been made a King's vessel, was just beginning to stream out on the first of the sea-breeze. "She looks well, my friend

Drake," said I; "you are entitled to my best thanks:"—we soon got on board. The decks were clean and clear; nothing in the way beyond the two hencoops abaft, and the two wedder sheep taken out of the Hero, that were to be removed into the boats as soon as stowed. The anchor was quickly up, and about half-past nine o'clock we hove-to off Port Royal, on the Shark's quarter. Her topsails were sheeted home, and she was ready to weigh:—Captain Townshend, however, came immediately on board the Porghee, to pay his respects to me; and that ceremony being ended, he returned on board, and in five minutes after, his brig was under sail, standing out to sea, the schooner keeping in his wake.

It was a delightful day, the weather fine, and the breeze steady; so we went cheerily along. On Wednesday, at noon, the colour of the water altered a little; and soon after, some breakers were discovered from the mast-head. Drake then hailed the Shark, requesting Captain Townshend to drop astern about a quarter of a mile, and keep in the Porghee's wake, on which we stood in boldly towards the breakers; knowing there was deep water close alongside of them, and when nigh enough, that he could run down with a flowing sheet. But when we drew near, Captain Townshend became alarmed, and made a whiff in his ensign; which was a signal to speak to us. We hove-to for an instant; when he hailed us, saying "he could see nothing but breakers, and no land, and that he was afraid both vessels would be lost."—Drake replied, "There was no fear: the water was deep all along outside the reefs; and they must follow the schooner with confidence." We filled again, and stood on to the westward. About three o'clock we saw the north end of St. George's Island, and the reef trending here to the southward; we then gradually altered our course, and a little before four o'clock opened the channel; when the promontory, which we had called Drake's Head, became discernible. We now crowded sail, and hoisted our colours, the Shark following our example. Drake had put up a flag-staff on the northern summit of George's Island; from whence we were now descried by the look-out, and their union jack hoisted. As we approached, the colours on the promontory went up, accompanied by a gun. Our friends on board were now in high spirits, seeing these demonstrations of our home being near; but the hearts of Eliza and myself were too full for speech; stretching themselves, as it were, to the shore, where so many affectionate but humble human beings (our fellow-creatures) were waiting anxiously to bless our return, as the agents of Heaven for their safety and happiness.

CHAPTER V.

“THIS, then, is the scene of your shipwreck and providential deliverance, Sir Edward,” said Mr. Rowley. “On the other side of the islands, my dear friend,” I replied; “I will show it you, in a day or two.” Our vessel at this moment was in stays, having to make a tack in rounding the southern extremity of the reef, which we had called the Dragon, to weather a small high rocky islet, between which, and St. George’s Island, is the main channel. In doing this, we were closely followed by the Shark, reaching over to the shore where the Germans had been located. On our approach, they all came down to the beach—men, women, and children; accompanied by our four carpenters, and their negro apprentices. This animated body gave us a noisy hurrah; which the brig, as well as ourselves, returned with a hearty cheer. The carpenters, who, I afterwards learnt, had gone every morning in the Avon to assist these new comers, now hastened back into the boat, and made sail after us. I was glad to see all this; it gave an appearance of life, to the strangers I brought with me; who, perhaps, expected to see little else than barren rocks, and a few meagre-looking inhabitants. But Drake had taken care that something more than this should excite our attention. He had intimated to Corporal Craig, that it would be proper to salute me with thirteen guns from the battery, whenever I should arrive: and when he called on Captain Townshend at Port Royal, he told him of the compliment that would be paid on our entering the harbour, expressing his hope that the Shark would return it. I knew nothing of this; and therefore was surprised when, as soon as we fairly came in, and had a full view of our mansion and the fort, I perceived the first gun fire. "What does that mean, Drake?" asked I. "A salute, Sir Edward," he replied. Then the second gun—"I hope they may not hurt themselves!" said my dear wife. The parson and Maria looked a little afraid. Craig fired his first ten guns, in very good time; but when he had to re-load, he made rather slow work of it: however, he finished his salute; and the brig took it up, returning the thirteen guns in good regular time, although he too had but ten guns. When the Shark had done, we answered with three cheers, and then prepared to anchor.

At the close of the salute, Diego made his appearance in the six-oared boat, with his men neatly equipped in white frocks and trousers, and straw hats, he himself sitting in the cockswain's box, dressed in nankeen: the men rowing a good stroke, the old fellow steering with great judgment. This to me was the most pleasing part of the exhibition. My dear wife, as well as myself, rejoiced to discern our old faithful servant again, while he was yet at a distance; and to see how well he had fulfilled my instructions, to perfect the negroes in rowing that boat.

I had put on my uniform, ready for landing; and as the Porghee let go her anchor, Diego's boat rowed up alongside; we all soon got in, not forgetting Fidele, our former, and once, only companion on these then lonesome shores. This idea crossed my mind at the time; and as if to give more force to it, Diego landed us on the very spot where he and his friends first stepped on shore from their canoe. Our brother and sister were on the beach to receive us: and close behind them our people stood in groups. The sun was then just setting, so that his last rays shone full upon them, and, perhaps, added to the look of gladness that brightened every brow. The greeting was hearty, but tumultuous: we could scarcely exchange caresses with our relatives; some of the people kissing our hands, or embracing our knees; Rota, and Mira, and Anne, hanging upon their mistress, shedding tears of joy. As we were walking up the side of the dell towards the mansion, we encountered Doctor and Mrs. Gordon, with whom we shook hands, inviting them to accompany us. Corporal Craig touched his hat as I passed him; and two sentinels, that he had placed before the door, presented arms. All this was seen from the Shark; which made a favourable impression on its captain and crew, as to the state of our infant settlement, and the feeling that subsisted between me and the people.

I was much pleased with the complete manner in which the mansion had been enlarged and finished. A piazza had been affixed all round, and the whole was handsomely painted. Our vigilant and attentive Rota had laid out the table for coffee, on hearing of our approach; and we were delighted to see every thing in its place, ready for our reception.

Thursday, 30th.—My dear wife and myself recommenced our early habits. We were up before the sun: Diego was already in waiting; and dear old Rota and Anne were come into the hall. My sister Maria and Rosalie were called; and, as soon as dressed, my dear Eliza took them, followed by Anne, to the bath below the rocks; and there initiated them in the most delightful and healthful of all practices in a tropical climate.

When they had departed, Diego commenced what would be called in the House of Commons, “a clear and luminous exposé on the state and condition of the settlement.” He complimented me on the honour King George had bestowed on me; which he had heard; and which he believed, by seeing a king’s ship come with us.

He heard say, too, that Captain Drake was now made a king's captain! And he felt that all this should make himself something, though he did not know what; but he hoped I was pleased with his boat, and with the men, and with himself! "I am well pleased with your boat, and with your men, and with yourself, Diego," I replied; "and you shall be called the 'Governor's Cocksawin.'" — "Thank you, sir," answered Diego; "but it is very long and hard name: though it sound very grand, every people won't speak it all." — "Well, then, if any one would call you Diego, it shall for the future be Don Diego, or Master Diego, which ever you like best." — "Master Diego, Governor Sir, if you please," he replied; "for if Spaniards come here, they will all only laugh to hear black man called Don Diego." — "It shall be as you please," returned I. He then proceeded to state all that had been done in the settlement, since my departure this time twelvemonth. His detail, in general, was highly satisfactory; and it is wonderful, without we recur to a unity of spirit as a bond of peace, how so many months could pass away, and so much be effected, without murmurings, or thefts, or immoralities of any kind, as far as he could discover. Some of the people had been sick, but none had died; and the births, altogether, had been seven, although, till now, we had not heard of any but our nephew, and Purdy's bouncing boy. "You remember, sir," said he, "that you apprenticed Peter and Paul to the two Allwoods; and Matthew and Mark to Xavier and to Derrick the carpenters; and Luke, to Hart the bricklayer. You gave two of my patriarchs, as you used to call them, Jacob and David, to turn the ground for your brother; and you gave him Felix for a servant. I have in the boat the four last new negro men, Patrick, Dennis, Murphy, and Darby; and also one that came before them, called John; and having Noah and Abel to choose between, out of our first people, to make six, I took Noah into the boat, and Abel is left to look after the stock, and keep the grounds in order. The soldiers behave very well, sir," continued he; "and the sawyers cut up great many fine plank, sir: but I do not know what my master the Governor will do with all them German people: they don't know anything, only make stockings; and if somebody want shoes, perhaps they never want stockings, only for great gentlemen or ladies; and one German woman can make more than everybody here will use." Diego finished, and I thanked him as he deserved: but he had not done until the bathers returned. And I have done but little justice to his speech, it having been five times as long as I have made it, though, perhaps, not five times more comprehensive.

"Master Diego, my lady!" said Rota, beginning a speech to my wife as she entered; and, I believe, even fuller of exultation, than her mistress was when she first spoke of her husband as Sir Edward! "Master Diego, my lady," repeated she, "has just been telling Master Governor, all the men have done since he went away; and he made very fine bows, and said fine sayings about King George. And Master Sir Edward Governor commended him, and said 'Master Diego.' I can't say anything; but I love my lady, and I hope my lady pleased with her servant." My dear Eliza took her by the hand, saying, "You are my faithful Rota."—"Thank my lady," replied Rota: "but will my lady let Rota be called Mistress Rota?"—"Yes, you shall be called Mistress Rota; I will do anything agreeable to you," returned my wife. Rota stood without reply. "Mistress Rota!" exclaimed Diego, "why do you not curtsy to kind lady, and thank her?"—"I am so full heart, Master Diego," she replied; "but our kind lady will forgive me." Mistress Rota now entered into a detail as to the employment she had given to Anne, Martha, Clara, Hebe, Rose, and Lily, the young negro women intrusted to her care, and under her direction during our absence. She then reminded her lady, that she had sent Mary, Delia, Phœbe, Pink, and Daisy, to Peccary Field, to be servants to her sister; adding that Hachinta, also, was there with her son, the first born in the island; while her own daughter Mira, her lady Señora's first maid, was still at her mother's; but now hoped, as she was in the family way, that Master Governor would give Jack Martin, her husband, a house to themselves. And having with this request finished her speech, Mistress Rota retired to get breakfast.

Master Diego waited for orders. "Your boat will be wanted," said I, "within an hour, for me to go on board the king's ship." He made a bow worthy of Mr. Nash, saying—"it shall be ready to attend your honour," and departed. As Diego was stepping out from the Piazza, Drake came up to the house. "Diego," cried Drake, "I want to speak to you."—"Master Diego, sir, if you please, Captain Drake!" I heard this, and could not help smiling. All Spaniards are great sticklers for title; but for fear Drake might be offended at poor Diego's reply, I called out,—“We have just promoted him.” My goodhumoured and excellent friend instantly comprehended the matter, and answered,—“Master Diego, I beg pardon, I wish to have the pleasure of speaking a word with you.”—"The pleasure to me, Captain Drake," replied Diego, taking off his hat almost to the ground, which he had just put on; "you my captain, I only master to you,—the Governor cockswain, sir." Drake laughed, and I could scarcely keep my gravity. "Why you laugh at me, captain?" said Diego, more angrily than I ever before had seen him. "I laugh," replied Drake, smiling, "because you tell me you are only my master."—"Well!" returned Diego, "what that? did I not say you my captain? You give me captain, I give you master; you then have boat, and I have schooner." I now thought it right to interpose, and explain to Diego, that he had misapplied the term master, and thereby had signified to Captain Drake that he was servant to him. "O, then," cried Diego, "I beg my good captain's pardon; he must think Master Diego fool so to speak, and might well laugh at him." The ladies, who stood by, were much amused with this dialogue, and began to joke Drake on the rencontre. "Very true," said he, "I must mind what I am about. I was told by one without, he was my master; I do not require to be told by any one within, that I have met my mistress; bowing at the same time gracefully and respectfully to Maria, who blushed and turned away. This was mere badinage, if a tender sentiment had no share in it; but such being the case, Drake looked serious, and considered it a public avowal; but every one laughed, not having yet recovered from the effect of the scene between Drake and his master.

At eight o'clock the colours were hoisted, being the time observed for this ceremony at Jamaica; and at the same moment Corporal Craig planted the sentinels. His whole regular force being only three men, he required great talents as an adjutant-general to dispose of them to the best advantage. This difficult arrangement, however, was rendered easy by simplification.—One man before the mansion; two always in the plank-house for relief, where they were to keep covert, and eat, drink, and sleep, during the stay of the Shark.

After breakfast, I was about to go on board to pay my respects to Captain Townshend, in return for the visit I had received from him at Port Royal; and I sent Drake forward, to inform him of my intention; but he begged I would not come, until after he had waited upon me on shore; saying that such proceeding was due to my situation, and that any other would lower the Governor of Seaward Islands in the eyes of his ship's company. This conduct, on his part, was noble and considerate; and, in about an hour after, he came on shore, where he was received with all the honour our slight means enabled us to bestow; a salute of cannon excepted! to which he was not by rank entitled: but on my returning the visit, he saluted me with thirteen guns; which Drake, and Craig's brigade, contrived to answer very respectably from the fort.

My brother provided a handsome dinner for us to-day at Peccary Field; to which the captain of the sloop of war, his officers, and Mr. Otway, (the gentleman sent to survey the islands,) were invited, besides Captain Drake, the Reverend Mr. Rowley, his wife, and ourselves. Dr. Gordon and his spouse, being yet inmates with my brother, were also of the party. Three turtle were now sent from the craal to the Shark, as a present to the ship's company, together with an abundant supply of pumpkins and melons: the latter, being produced everywhere on the island in great abundance.

Mr. Dilkes was now ordered to land all the household goods from the schooner, and in our absence to place them as directed by Mistress Rota: Derrick, with his apprentice, having received instructions not to go to German Town to-day, but to remain to put up the bedsteads, and to do such other things as might require the hand of a carpenter.

We left Rosalie to take care of Mr. Rowley's children, and Fidele to bear them company. Drake took a seat with us in the boat, and complimented Master Diego on the appearance of his boat's crew. The Shark's boat put off from the ship, soon after we put off from the shore; lying on their oars till we came abreast of them: there were three officers, and a midshipman, with Captain Townshend. He said,—“ Show us the way!” Master Diego was very proud to lead; but he was not insensible of the inferiority of his men, as rowers, to the sailors in the boat astern. Every now and then he would say,—“ Look to white sailors, men! Long pull—you Murphy, feather your oar, sir! Quite shamed of some of you!” Then he finished, by saying,—“ Beg Master Governor's pardon, for talking to the people before him; but if king's captain will make his boat row for pattern sometimes, Master Diego will talk to his men then.” “ You shall have the king's boat for a pattern,” I replied; “ your men do better than I could have expected, and I am sure they will now soon perfect themselves.”

Our friends met us on the beach at Peccary Field, and we all walked up together. The strangers admired the place much, and the beautiful prospect from it, which the surrounding shores, a fine sheet of water, and the view of the noble promontory, presented. On going up to the house, we came upon the ground where my dear Eliza and myself, with our faithful little dog, had fought the Peccaries; and I seized on the occasion, to tell them the story on the spot. The eyes of all the officers were instantly riveted on my Eliza, to whom Captain Townshend paid a handsome compliment on her true heart. On our arrival at the house, the young stranger, my nephew, was presented to our notice; and soon after, the Reverend Mr. Rowley proceeded to the offices of baptism. The child was named James, and every thing proper was done on the occasion.

My brother had not neglected to add many things of convenience, and even elegance, to his residence during my absence; and I was agreeably surprised by these demonstrations of taste and wealth. We sat down fourteen to a well-covered table, at which Felix acted as butler, and four of the women, neatly dressed, attended. He gave us good wine and excellent punch; and by help of a present of fruit from Jamaica, a handsome dessert crowned the feast. Xavier had been detained from going to work at German Town to-day; he and Hachinta being ordered to regale the boat's crew of the Shark, as also Master Diego and his men, with dinner, and coffee, and cigars.

About nine o'clock we all returned home, well pleased with our entertainment; and Captain Townshend said, he was very glad to find his men all sober. I assured him they never should be otherwise during their stay here; but that his whole ship's company should have fish or turtle, and such fruit and vegetables as the islands produced, every day sent to them. It had been arranged after dinner, for Messrs. Otway and Drake to set out on the morrow, in the Avon, to prosecute their survey; and, of course, preparations were to be made early in the morning for their departure.

About ten o'clock of the day, the surveying party set sail, taking a midshipman, and four sailors from the Shark, besides two sailor lads, John Stone and Harry Rock. The mansion not being yet quite in order to give a great dinner, I proposed to Captain Townshend to accompany me to-day in the schooner to visit the Germans; and, in truth, my Eliza was extremely anxious to see them, on account of her promise to the Queen. She therefore was rejoiced to go; leaving Rosalie to superintend the unpacking of plate, and china, and so forth, and Mistress Rota to get a comfortable family dinner, for our guests.

Diego and his crew were taken on board the Porghee, in addition to the four men belonging to the vessel. We were soon under weigh; and as the harbour with its two extremes, stretched north and south,—George's Island lying on the east, and Edward's Island on the west,—we sailed with a flowing sheet to the German settlement between them, and in less than an hour anchored in a little bay to the southward of the place. As soon as the schooner was anchored, we went to shore in our boat, and were met on the beach by all the people. They stood nearly in a row, at a short distance from the spot where the boat landed; but the eight carpenters, who had gone over in the morning in canoes, had come down before the boat touched the shore, and hauled her bow well up out of the water. Having, therefore, stepped out easily on the sand, we walked up to the people, my dear wife being under my arm.

I instantly commenced a fine speech to them, in which I promised them my protection, frequently alluding to the interest her Majesty took in their welfare; and, occasionally pointing to Lady Seaward, told them, they would find a valuable friend here, not only because they "were wanderers, and without a home," (using her own words to me when pleading their cause!) but because they were the country-people of our most gracious Queen. I had become quite animated, and even eloquent, and had hoped to have excited a lively and sensible joy among them by my oratory; but, to my great disappointment, they all looked grave, and uneasy, and discontented: a momentary silence ensued, followed by a murmur. Soon after, two of the men stepped a little forward, and said a few words in German. "What can this mean?" said I to the carpenters, who stood behind me. "They don't know any word Massa Governor have spoke to them: they very ignorant people, sir," replied Allwood. I looked at Captain Townshend, who could not help smiling. "Your fine speech," said he, "has been thrown away."—"Yes," responded my dear Eliza, "and I am much disappointed at their knowing nothing of English; the more so, because no one among us can speak German. It will be a great drawback," continued she, "on their comforts, during the separation which this ignorance, on both sides, may occasion:" then turning round to Allwood, as she continued to speak; "we have no more right to despise these poor people for not knowing English, than they have to despise you, Mr. Allwood, for not speaking German."—"Lady Ma'am," replied the carpenter, "you never saw fellows handle a piece of wood like them; and then they call a tree a boom, and every one of us zimmerman,* as if we had but one name among us." My dear Eliza smiled, and Captain Townshend and myself could not help laughing at Allwood's criterion of talent.

There was now a pause, when my dear wife whispered to me,—“Perhaps some of them may understand French: do you think you would venture to ask the question?”—"Captain Townshend," said I, "do you speak French?"—"Pas beaucoup," he replied, "and so badly that I cannot venture to attempt it."—"I am sorry for that," was my answer, "as I am but a novice myself, and if I were to attempt it, I certainly should blunder."—"I speak more imperfectly than you do, my honoured husband," rejoined my Eliza; "yet let us walk among them, and I will try to address the women." I obeyed her wish, and as we passed along they made their obeisance to us. The women and children were together at the further end of the line, some of whom were pretty in spite of their national dress; but there was one among them, whose air, and manner, and apparel, differed somewhat from the rest. She caught my wife's eye in a moment, and advanced a step. "Parlez-vous François?" said my Eliza, at the same time taking the woman by the hand to assure her. "Oui, Madame," she replied; "moi-même, je suis de Tionville, sur la Moselle; quoique mon mari, soit Allemand."—"C'est la même chose!" said my dear wife; "je me suis bien content, vous à trouver parmi les autres;" and then she proceeded to desire the woman to tell them, that the Governor would afford every protection and comfort in his power; also, that the Queen of England had recommended them to her special care; and that she would lose no opportunity of doing them a kindness, so long as they conducted themselves well. As the woman of French Flanders turned the French into German, the other women shouted, and the men showed some sullen signs of dubious satisfaction; and that is all that can be said of them. Captain Townshend and myself now took our turn to put questions to the fair interpreter; and he quickly discovered himself to be the only sensible French scholar among us. "How are they off for tobacco?" asked Captain Townshend. "They have not any," answered she. "Tell them," said I, "that I will send them some." She did so; and the moment they heard it, joy seemed to take possession of the men, transforming them instantly into beings of a social aspect: the fact was, they wanted tobacco, and were therefore miserable.

We now proceeded to visit their cabins; which occupied nearly a mile of a fine fertile slope, each having a distance between, of nearly a hundred and fifty yards from its neighbours. Eight of the cabins were fully built, and the other four in great forwardness. Each cabin consisted of two apartments; which were sufficiently neat and clean, in the finished habitations, and furnished with wooden bowls and coarse crockery, and a few cooking utensils. My dear wife kept the Flanders woman close to her: and now, by the assistance of Captain Townshend, various questions were put, as we proceeded from place to place. They had received the Queen's bounty, viz. ten dollars and a suit of clothes to each person, just before embarking at Port Royal, so that they had spent but a small portion of their money. After satisfying ourselves as well as we could, as to their feelings and their wants, we took leave of them, commending their industry, and renewing the promise of some tobacco to-morrow, with which both men and women were well satisfied.

Jack Martin had taken upon himself the office of cook on board our little vessel, and had provided a good fish and a boiled fowl for our dinner; to which we sat down upon deck, with the awning spread, while the schooner lay at anchor. Dinner, or any other repast, taken under shade in the open air, is always agreeable; and we certainly had a practical proof of the truth of this observation to-day, for we enjoyed our scrambling meal infinitely more than we did our dinner yesterday, when we ate and drank with every conveniency, not to say elegance of accommodation. Our naval guest seemed to have imbibed a new life by this excursion: he hitherto had been reserved in conversation, but now he talked freely on every subject; not sparing his uncle, Sir Robert Walpole, for his backwardness in giving the Dons a "good licking," as he expressed it; which, he contended, they for a long time had justly merited. But it was now our turn to be a little reserved, when the minister became the subject of conversation, whom, although he might choose to blame, it was not likely he should take pleasure in hearing him censured by others. I should have liked, however, to smoke a cigar, by way of dessert, on the deck; but my ever-considerate Eliza dissuaded me from doing so, saying, that "the poor Germans might see the smoke, which would make them the more uneasy for the want of their tobacco." About five o'clock we got under weigh, and coasting along close to the shore of Edward's Island, by Long Bay, had a sight of our sheep; which had increased to a pretty flock. After this, we stood for the anchorage, and landed a little before sunset. My sister and our guests, with their two little daughters, followed by Rosalie with Fidele, came down to meet us; and we all returned together, accompanied by Captain Townshend, to coffee.

I had forgot that to-morrow would be Saturday, and muster-day, until reminded of it by Diego. "Do the Germans come over?" said I. "Yes, sir," he replied; "they row themselves over in their own boat every Saturday, and after muster take back the week's allowance."—"That is well," I replied; "but on this occasion you must give two pounds of tobacco to each man. And now, Master Diego," continued I, "one of the sheep brought from Jamaica must be killed to-night, also a couple of large turtle; and desire some of your men to make a torch fishing. Let Mistress Rota have a fore-quarter of the sheep, and the calapee and fins of one of the turtle, and provide her with a couple or three fine groopers from the fish-pots; then see that the hind-quarter of the sheep is sent on board the Shark to the Captain, with my compliments; and let the other half, and the remainder of the turtle, and a sufficiency of mullet, with plenty of yams, be dressed, for all the men to dine under the shade of the promontory near the spring, when muster is over; and you must find cooks among the women. But don't forget," added I, "to send turtle every night, or early every morning, on board the king's vessel; and if you can furnish them with one hundred mullet daily, without depriving our people of their proper complement of fish, do so." After my conference with Diego was over, I joined our friends at coffee, and told Captain Townshend, that my black cockswain, Don Diego, had reminded me that to-morrow would be our muster-day. I then promised our guest, he should see the Trainband exercise and fire; requesting the pleasure of his company, and that of his officers, to dinner after it was over; which invitation he politely accepted, soon after taking his leave.

My brother had been at the mansion in our absence this morning, but not finding me at home had returned. Having now made up my mind for the events of to-morrow, I sent a canoe immediately, with a note to him, and another to Doctor and Mrs. Gordon, to invite them to the parade, and to dinner. My dear wife and myself then consulted on further measures, among which, Mrs. Allwood was to be put in requisition for guinea-fowl. Matters being thus arranged, Rota was sent for, and closeted with her mistress, where she received her instructions in detail as to the dinner.

We were all astir at the cotton-tree plantation before daylight, and great preparations going on, both without and within the mansion. At eight o'clock Diego sounded the bugle; and before ten, the boats had arrived from Allwoods, and from German Town, and Peccary Field, and the schooner's crew were already on shore. By eleven o'clock, the men had put on their regimentals and accoutrements, and were under arms at the Fort, to the number of forty; besides my brother, who was their captain; and Mr. Dilkes, their ensign; and Corporal Craig, with his regulars of three, who constituted the non-commissioned officers to the body: Drake, who was their lieutenant, was absent. Captain Townshend, with some of his officers, favoured us with their company on the ground; and all our other friends were present. The men acquitted themselves very well, all things considered: after which they were marched to the isthmus; where they fired six rounds of ball each, at a target, with tolerable effect: they were then paraded and dismissed.

At one o'clock their feast was ready. We had all returned to the mansion as soon as the military business was over, but now we again proposed paying them a visit. The ladies, however, declined being of the party: but Captain Townshend and his officers, together with my brother and Mr. Dilkes, and the Parson and Doctor, walked off with me through the woodland region; and we arrived at the spring just as they were sitting down to their feast. They were seated on planks, raised a little off the ground by large stones, all in a row, with their backs to the rock; a line of planks being, by way of table, placed before them, supported in a similar manner. Each man had his knife, but there was neither fork nor plate. A biscuit, a great piece of yam, a lime, a green capsicum, and some salt in a sea-shell, were placed before every person. The women handed boiled mullet round in a great basket, from which one was taken, and laid on the board before each man. After they had satisfied themselves with fish, six large brown deep dishes with turtle were placed before them, and a small half calabash and spoon given to each person by way of soup plate. In a very short time, they demolished the turtle; and while the calabashes were removed, and the clean sides of the planks turned uppermost, a cup of lime punch was served to each. And now the half sheep was brought in, on four coarse brown round dishes; shoulder, breast, loin, and leg, all roasted. The people did ample justice to this their third course,—the greatest rarity in the tropical world, good English wedder mutton! leaving scarcely anything on the bones, for our good watch-dog, Lion; who would have been sorely disappointed, had he known how those bones had once been covered! They finished their feast with coffee and cigars; giving three cheers to King George and the Governor.

At the appointed hour, we sat down to dinner at the mansion: but our feast, being much like a great dinner in England, shall be passed over without further notice; with this difference, however, that all that remained, when taken from table, was ordered to be distributed among the women and children of the soldiers, and others in our immediate neighbourhood.

Sunday, the 3d of July, was our first Sabbath among our people, after an absence of more than a year. "My dear Edward," said Eliza, "we must not suffer the observance of this holy day to be a matter of less importance to us now, than when we walked with God in this peaceful paradise, in the full enjoyment of each other, and of his divine presence. But indeed, my beloved husband," continued she, "I do not desire to deceive you, or my own heart, or to dissemble with my heavenly Father; but rather to acknowledge that for a long time past I have been sensible of the briars and thorns which have sprung up in our path—the cares and riches of this world—which have interposed themselves much between even our most kind and tender affections: and have in a great degree separated me from the only true blessing, the abiding presence of our God!" She wept; I was silent: but my heart went along with every word she said; and I almost wished that I were again building up our plank house by her side, with none to behold us, but our faithful little dog, and the Eye that delighteth in innocence and humility.

There was not room in the halls of the mansion for all the people, now quite a hundred; besides, it was arranged that Captain Townshend should send half his ship's company to prayers. Boards were therefore placed on bricks, like so many benches, close round the spurs of the silk-cotton tree; and there we assembled, by the ringing of the bell, at ten o'clock. Every one, not excepting the Germans, and their wives and children, appeared in clean clothing; and, for the most part, they were neatly attired. The King's sailors were dressed in white jackets and trousers, with small white straw hats. The clergyman took his place between two of the spurs, where a chair was placed for him, with its back to the tree. The prayers were read with due solemnity; and if there was not a general devotion in his congregation, there was every appearance of it. But to the poor Germans, alas! it was like the Latin service to its papal worshippers.

Mr. Rowley concluded with a most instructive and impressive sermon; taking some of the first chapter of St. John for his text:—"In the beginning was the Word," etc. He held up to our contemplation the Divine Being creating all that our eyes behold, and lastly, ourselves. And then he proceeded to show that the same Creative Power, "the Word and Wisdom of God," came down from Heaven at the appointed time, and became incarnate in the person of Jesus. By which union of perfect God and perfect man, he became the Christ, full of grace and truth: dispensing sight to the blind, hearing to the deaf, speech to the dumb, motion to the palsied, cleansing the leper, and even raising the dead. The preacher, moreover, showed, that these miracles were typical of the Saviour's power over the destructive maladies of the human heart, which bring forth sin and spiritual death; and that having left his blessed Gospel as our inheritance, to guide us in the path of life, he died on the Cross, making an atonement for our sins, saying—" It is finished."

After the service was over, my commission as Governor and Commandant of the islands, was read to the people. I then addressed them on their duties to God, and to all persons put in authority over them, and to each other: and said, it would be my endeavour, as it was my duty, to set them a good example in all Christian and moral duties; that I would make their welfare my chief care, as it hitherto always had been; and that, in a little time, I would arrange a plan with their pastor for the education of their children, and such others as might choose to avail themselves of it. Several of the people, when I ceased speaking, invoked a blessing on me: and surely it is a delightful thing for kings and governors to hear themselves blessed by the people.

They now betook themselves to their respective boats, and returned to their several settlements; the sailors departing at the same time to their ship. Captain Townshend expressed himself as highly pleased, and deeply impressed, by the scene he had just witnessed. "I am convinced, Sir Edward Seaward," said he, "that religion is the basis of every genuine virtue; and a due reverence for the Sabbath, the foundation on which all sound discipline, and good order, must be raised. You may flog men into the appearance of being orderly, but then it is only an appearance; and sometimes, when order is most required, it then is nowhere to be found. I was glad,"

continued he, "to see my men so attentive; and they will all be the better for it for a while. I wish they could have such an opportunity more frequently." My dear wife said to me, in a sweet low voice, as we walked homewards, which no one heard but myself,—“How gracious was the sight to-day! Yes, my Edward, that dear silk cotton tree, is to us like the Oak of Mamre.”

We dined quietly to-day, having no addition to our table but Captain Townshend, whose intelligence and gentlemanly conduct had won much on our esteem.

Early on Monday morning, the ship carpenters were sent from the Shark, at my request, to fit up a powder magazine within the cave, with double doors; a pane of glass to be fixed in the inner one, and a place to contain a light behind it. These doors were to occupy the breach by which I had passed from the outward into the inner cave, where the treasure had been deposited; and this was to be done for the purpose of making the inner cave our powder magazine. Hart, the bricklayer, attended the carpenters, to do his part in fitting in and building up the door-posts: and I was glad to be able to accomplish this necessary job, without taking off our own carpenters from the completion of the Germans' habitations. In two days the magazine was completed; and the twelve barrels of gunpowder landed from the Shark and lodged; as were also our other ammunition, and blank cartridges.

On Tuesday afternoon, Mr. Otway and Drake returned, from making their survey of the reefs and shoals which surround these islands; and also of the different channels, by which they are accessible. The period, therefore, drew near for bidding adieu to the Shark. My dear wife had written her letter to the Queen, and one to Lady Sundon. Neither did we forget to make our acknowledgments to Governor and Mrs. Trelawney; and we also embraced the opportunity of writing to our friends in England. With these packets from us, and many good wishes, Captain Townshend took his leave on Wednesday at noon; and, agreeable to our promise, Mr. Dilkes, in the Avon, saw him into safety clear of the reefs, and laying his course for the north end of Jamaica.

CHAPTER VI.

WE had now leisure to attend to our immediate affairs. The two pipes of Madeira were landed, and rolled into the cave, and there housed. Drake was desired to get the shot on shore from the schooner, and pile it up in form on the battery; and, with the assistance of Corporal Craig, to see that a due quantity of powder was filled, and every thing relating to our ordnance properly regulated. My brother and myself now went industriously to work, to make up the accounts of each individual in the colony, which cost us the labour of some days; but by the middle of the ensuing week, all these were arranged, and that between him and myself also. This latter, however, was involved in such complexity, that it could only be settled by a liberal disposition on each side; and as he acknowledged to have cleared upwards of 25,000 dollars during my absence, he was in a condition to act as handsomely towards me as I was disposed to act towards him. On my leaving Seaward Islands last year, he was indebted to me 2050 dollars. It was agreed that I should receive this sum; and also 1000 dollars for Peccary Field, the wood, and lands adjoining, as marked out on the plan of the estate; that I should charge him nothing for the use he had made of the Porghee, but that he should pay the wages of the captain and crew, as had been stipulated. He then paid me over the money, and our business was completed. On the 14th we settled with all the people; many of whom, especially the carpenters, received a pretty good sum, after deducting the amount due for their supplies.

It was arranged that the Porghee should sail for Jamaica on Monday the 18th, or within a few days after; and that my brother James should take a passage in her, to buy the vessel Mr. Finn had been desired to procure. And it was determined that Mr. Dilkes should be his skipper, with the Porghee's crew; and that Drake should endeavour to procure a mate and midshipman from the men of war, with the twelve men the Commodore had promised. Doctor Gordon having had little to do since his arrival, and being a great favourite with my brother, in whose house he had resided nearly six months, frequently accompanied James to the store, where he had assisted him materially, especially on two late occasions, when Spanish vessels visited the islands for commercial purposes. This was fortunate as to the present conjuncture; for he could, in consequence, confide his business to him while absent; it not being possible for me, from my official situation, to intermeddle in such matters.

On the 21st, the Porghee sailed; my brother taking with him nearly 20,000 dollars, about 4760*l.* sterling, the greater part of which it was his intention to remit to England. I wrote letters by Drake, to the Governor of Jamaica, and to the Commodore; and sent by him two Spanish gold sword-handles, for their acceptance. On our friends taking their leave of us, Mrs. James Seaward shed some tears on parting with her husband; and a tear stood in my dear sister's eye, ready to drop. Drake took her gently by the hand; she held her face aside, saying,—"Take care of yourself, and James."

There was not an order for supplies of any kind by the Porghee, the settlement not being in want of anything necessary either for the industry or comfort of the people. But I sent for a lot of small change, from the sixteenth of a dollar upwards, to the amount of 200 dollars; as I wished to establish an internal traffic with a money medium, as a means of facilitating that industry which it was my intention to foster as far as it might be practicable.

The cabins of the Germans were now completed ; and on Friday, Mr. and Mrs. Rowley, accompanied by my sister and Rosalie, and our faithful little dog, (not to be despised nor forgotten, because we have now other company,) embarked with my dear wife and myself in the Avon, to pay them a visit. The tobacco had put them in good humour, having dissipated, with its cordial smoke, that sullenness we could not but observe at our former visit. Rosalie was of much service to us, in communicating with the Flemish woman ; through whom alone we could converse with her friends. They were well satisfied with their habitations, but were nearly ignorant of tropical husbandry, having received only a short and incomplete lesson from Diego and his men, about the time of the last May rains ; when ten acres of land were cleared, hoed, and planted, by their joint efforts. Most of them, however, had been brought up to forest or agricultural labour. But, luckily, one was a weaver ; and another had been a sausage-maker, or a beef and ham smoker. I hoped in time to find work for the weaver in his own way, as all the women could spin as well as knit ; but in a hot country, the other man's occupation seemed totally unavailable. After taking a careful survey of them and their wants, we made a note of every thing : and informed them, that on Monday they should be supplied with all things necessary ; that fish-pots should be made for them ; and as their cabins were now finished, they must do every thing in their power to diminish the quantity of beef and pork drawn from the store ; that each family should have a couple of goats given to them, and four fowls, and as many ducks ; that as soon as their own little harvest was got in, they should be supplied with pigs also: that they must each cut hurdles, and enclose a piece of ground for their yams and cocoas, and corn, pumpkins, melons, and tobacco, etc., as the crops could not otherwise be safe from the stock, especially the pigs; and I promised to send persons to show them how to proceed in the various operations that would be required. Our colonists seemed well satisfied with what we had done, and with all we promised to do; and before we left them, the men began to fill a pipe, and regale us with the smoke, as the best incense they could burn on the occasion.

We returned to the Fort to dinner; after which we entered on some very minute discussions respecting the people. I perceived that I had committed an error, in not mixing the Germans with the others, that they might have an opportunity of learning our language, and many other necessary matters peculiar to the climate in which they were placed. But as I did not see how I could, with the appearance of consistency, alter my plan suddenly, I determined to correct the error as future occasion might allow. However, Mr. Rowley kindly undertook to go to German Town three times a week, from nine o'clock till two, to instruct the children. And the ladies suggested the utility of sending some of the children of the soldiers, and of the bricklayer, now and then, to visit the Germans; and for them to receive, in return, some of the German children; as a means of facilitating the general intercourse, by spreading a mutual knowledge of each other's language. And it was agreed, as preparatory to this step, that Mr. Rowley should take the soldiers' children with him during the three days he would attend at German Town; and on the other three days, on which he would keep school here, the German children should be sent for in the morning, and sent back at two o'clock. I congratulated myself on these arrangements and on the great kindness of Mr. Rowley, whose health now, by the influence of this genial climate, was perfectly restored.

On the morrow, after muster, the plan of education was explained to the people; to which they made no sort of objection. And I told Herbert, the tailor, that I wished him to go every morning by daylight, with some of his family, by canoe to German Town, to assist the settlers there in altering their clothing, and in cutting out and making such new garments as they were to receive from Lady Seaward; and I would pay him and his family for whatever time and assistance they might give them. This measure had a twofold object,—to assist them, as was proposed, and to do a little towards rectifying the error I had committed in isolating them from the other settlers. My dear wife now made out a list of such things as were wanted from the store for the Germans; which she sent to my brother's factotum; and the Queen herself, could not have desired them to be more completely supplied, even down to scissors, needles, pins, and thread.

These poor people made their appearance as usual on the Sabbath, and attended divine service with as much regularity as if they understood all they heard; but as they were all Protestants, we ventured to hope, that by the divine blessing, and our best exertions, the day would soon come when they should profit, in common with ourselves, by the excellent ministry of our worthy pastor.

On Monday morning, Doctor Gordon was ready to deliver the multifarious order to the Germans; but he requested that some one should be sent to witness the delivery. And he took the trouble to come to the mansion, to explain to Lady Seaward, that it would be of importance to divide the things fairly among them, and not leave it to be done among themselves; for that she might be assured they would quarrel about it. His suggestion was approved; and he was desired to take Rosalie, and also to ask Mrs. Gordon to accompany him, to assist in making the division according to the number in each family; excepting in the case of house utensils, which had been noted down for whom they were respectively intended. These arrangements being made, Doctor Gordon and his wife, and Rosalie, embarked in the Avon, with the presents—for such they were—amounting in value to 120 dollars, besides the goats and poultry. Herbert and his family had gone before, and they proved a useful addition to the distributing commissioners; Herbert's measure and shears being frequently called upon to execute justice. In the course of a few days, Master Diego supplied the Germans with fish-pots; and they received at the same time, from my own storehouse, spades, hoes, and bill-hooks, in sufficient number; the use of which Diego endeavoured, by practical language, to explain; and, with the help of his men, he also made a hurdle in their presence;—a pattern from which they were to copy, and make their enclosures.

The carpenters being now all disengaged, I turned my attention towards building the house intended for Doctor Gordon, in the northern angle of Allwood's Bay; which had, indeed, been begun just before the Germans arrived, but the workmen were obliged to desist, for the purpose of erecting their habitations. The sawyers had worked constantly on the timber that had been cut down at Allwood's Bay, and at Peccary Field; so that, besides the great supply which they had contributed, to build the cabins at German Town, there yet remained a considerable quantity of boards for any other building. Before my brother went away, he signified to me that he should like

Doctor Gordon to have a house, with some land allotted to it, in his neighbourhood; that such vicinity would be pleasant to both the families, and that his assistance at the store would be more available. I stated this to my dear Eliza, and after some conference it was agreed that I should state my brother's wish to Doctor Gordon, and ask him if he would like it; and if he assented, I should then give orders for his habitation, according to my brother's desire:—And that after it was done, I should still commence building a house at Allwoods; but on an improved scale, as if for myself; and give it to Drake, in the case of his marriage with my sister. I lost no time in opening the business to Doctor Gordon, who, with his characteristic caution, requested time to consider of it. But, after a day or two, he called on me to say, “ he would accept it, all conditions remaining the same, the change of situation excepted.” And the following morning was fixed on for selecting the spot, and dining with our sister afterwards at Peccary Field.

We went over at an early hour, leaving no one at home but Mrs. Rota and her black domestics, to take care of the mansion. Mrs. Seaward was delighted by the coming of the whole family; Fidele being no insignificant a member; having fought bravely here against the Peccaries, whose name the field now bears.

Attended by Master Diego, the Doctor and myself went forth to fix on the site of his future residence. We proceeded eastward, until we crossed the little rill that empties itself into the head of the creek. “This is the boundary of my brother's property,” said I; “now look about, and we will build your house wherever you like, and attach a piece of land to it for cultivation.” The Doctor said, “Very well, sir,” Setting forward at a good pace, he thus kept Diego and myself going, for more than a couple of hours, in the heat of the sun, sometimes doubling like a hare, but never coming to any determination. During this walk of exploration, I had frequent occasion to observe the young fruit trees of the shaddock, and the orange, and the lime, grown up, some to five, some to eight feet in height; the seeds of which, my dear wife and myself had put into the ground in February 1734, on the very day we fought with the Peccaries! and I as frequently endeavoured to draw Doctor Gordon's attention to these luxuriant and promising plants. But he was more intent on finding a piece of profitable ground, than fruit trees, or a pleasant situation for his house. I had proposed two different positions for him; but the one "was bare," that is, rocky; and the other was "rank with bushes." At length, I sat down under the shade of a large tree by the rivulet's side, and desired Diego, who cared little for the rays of the sun, "to whom he had been long a neighbour, and near bred," as Othello would say, to go on with the Doctor, wherever he might please to take him. They had scarcely proceeded ten yards from me, when I heard Master Diego begin to lay down the law to the Doctor; whom I heard very soon reply, "You don't know anything about it, sir." The end of it was, they returned to me in half an hour, without anything having been determined, the Doctor dripping at every pore with perspiration.—"We will walk slowly home," said I, "and take some weak rum and water, and strip and rub ourselves well with dry towels, and shift our clothes." "I like your practice, Sir Edward," said he, "it is most excellent prophylactic treatment." After our return, the Doctor was made comfortable; and, although I less required it, I pursued the same measures. My kind wife assisted me, and Mrs. Gordon did the same needful office for her husband,

But my dear wife laughed at my description of Gordon's procedure, while his own wife was very angry at him for having behaved in so absurd a manner.

After our grooming, we sat down to an excellent dinner. A roast kid, a pair of guinea fowls, and a pepper-pot, besides the usual dish of fish. We were all remarkably cheerful. The baby was brought in with the dessert, to amuse the ladies; and at my dear wife's request, Rosalie came also, and played and sung, while the parson's two little daughters danced to her guitar. When the ladies retired, the Doctor, the Parson, and myself regaled ourselves with a bowl of lime punch; and before we saw the bottom of it, the Doctor had come to a conclusion, in his own mind, as to the site of his dwelling. "Sir Edward," said he, "I have concluded on the spot we first came to, after crossing the burne, just above the creek where you catch the crayfish. There is good drinking water close by, and some of the land is not very bad."—"Very well, Doctor Gordon," I replied, "that shall be the place. The workmen shall set about the house early in the next week; and in the meanwhile you may mark out the exact spot yourself, by driving pegs into the ground, forty feet by sixteen; if such should meet your wishes."—"Just that," said he; stretching his hand at the same time across the table, for me to take hold of; that thereby I might put my hand, if not my seal, to the contract.

In the cool of the evening, before returning to our boat, the whole party made a détour of my brother's plantation. All the ground-provisions, as they are called, looked remarkably well. Being completely hoed, they were clean and luxuriant. The sugar-canes were few, but flourishing; and as there was no intention of carrying their propagation further than having a few for the people to eat by way of a luxury, cuttings had been given to the settlers at Allwood's Bay, and to the soldiers. The pineapple plants had been multiplied by the transplantation of offsets, and many of the old ones were in full bearing. There was a large field of maize and guinea-corn, and a considerable plot of fine tobacco. The fruit trees, raised from the pips sown by the hand of my dear Eliza and myself, were five or six feet high in several directions; and the two shaddock and orange trees, brought from Jamaica in tubs, were beyond a man's reach to their topmost branches, and now in blossom. Some plantain and banana trees were already loaded with fruit; and pumpkins and melons might be seen in every direction. There being nothing now wanting in the vegetable kingdom, to perfect the beauty of this enchanting spot, but the maturity of the orange trees; whose golden fruit, richly glowing in beautiful contrast amid its dark green foliage, might remind the classic spectator of the garden of the Hesperides.

Master Diego and his crew were in waiting for us. Having finished a most agreeable and refreshing walk in the cool of the evening, through my brother's grounds, we then enjoyed an equally pleasant row of a short hour to our own home. Coffee awaited us on our return; and while sitting over this agreeable beverage, smoking my cigar, the children of the colony were made the subjects of our conversation. We counted up fifteen children, seven boys and eight girls, belonging to the tailor, mason, and the four soldiers, between four and twelve years of age; and eighteen belonging to the Germans, viz. eleven boys and seven girls, between the ages of two years and fourteen. These were large numbers, to be transported a distance of six miles morning and evening. But it was concluded, that as the soldiers were located at the northern extremity of the isthmus, and Herbert the tailor occupied a house there also; and that as Soldiers' Town was more than four miles from the Fort, and only two miles from German Town; it would be advisable to cut a footpath through a defile, now thickly grown with acacias, prickly pears, aloes, and other thorny plants, which hitherto had prevented overland communication between German Town and Peccary Field, by a distance of not more than one mile. And also to build a school-room at the back of the Black Rock, between Soldiers' Town and the Doctor's allotment. I had no hesitation in adopting this plan; for, independent of the daily responsibility of transporting all these children, I could not well spare a boat's crew to do it.

I sent for Diego before I went to bed, and told him, he must take his boat's crew, and the two sawyers, and two of my brother's men, (Jacob and David, who formerly had worked with him,) early to-morrow morning, and commence cutting a footpath between the hills, from Peccary Field to German Town. Also, to send the four carpenters to me; who with their apprentices, and Hart the bricklayer and his apprentice, were to set about erecting a school-room at the back of the Black Rock, opposite Peccary Field. And I said, that I would go in his boat to my brother's house, as soon as he might be ready in the morning.

Soon after daylight we were up and dressed, and the men ready. I told Allwood, the room must be thirty feet long, and twenty feet broad, and fourteen feet high in its sides; and to pick out timber, and boards, and planks accordingly, while Hart prepared the foundation. Mr. Rowley and myself embarked with Diego, while Hart and his apprentice followed in a canoe. On our arrival, I explained my business to Mrs. Seaward, and to Doctor Gordon; requesting the latter to pardon me for delaying his house for another fortnight, as I conceived the occasion a public duty, and somewhat pressing, having seen sufficient reason for abandoning the plan of carrying the children to and fro by water. "Jus bonum dicis. Just that, as we say in the North," said the Doctor, without demurring; "all private right must needs be set aside for the public good. And I shall be glad enough," continued he, "to see a school-room near to Mr. James (meaning my brother), and to myself, which might be a great advantage to this neighbourhood." I thanked the Doctor for the handsome way in which he had received my proposition; then, after taking breakfast, we set off from Peccary Field House, and walked round the head of the creek, where the Doctor stopped us to look at the spot he had fixed on for his house: the very spot we had first arrived at, on the day he walked forth to make his selection. Hence we proceeded to the north side of the Black Rock, where we met Hart. The choice of the site for the school was left to Mr. Rowley; who, without much hesitation, fixed on a rocky hillock about two hundred yards to the northward of the rock; the intermediate space consisting of wiry grass and shrubby plants. I approved his selection; and at once, with the assistance of Hart, we marked out the angular points. That done, we returned by the way we came, leaving our very capable builder to go to work in making a level foundation. About mid-day the carpenters arrived at the head of the creek, in the Avon, with a cargo of materials; which they had to carry round the rock, to the site of the intended school-room. In the evening, Mr. Rowley and myself were piloted home by Master Diego, who gave us a good account of his own progress.

On the following day, I felt a degree of leisure and rest of mind which I had not experienced since my last arrival. The German men were set to work fishing, and making their hurdles for enclosures; their women, under the guidance of Herbert and his family, were employed on their clothing. The carpenters and bricklayer had occupation given to them for at least a fortnight; and Diego, with the disposable force of the settlement, would have enough to do to cut the new way between the hills, within the same period. The soldiers had their alternate day of guard at the plank-house; while Corporal Craig took the look-out at the flag-staff, and did duty as a sort of town-major, where in truth there was yet nothing worthy of the name of a town.

On the evening of this day we all went out to refresh ourselves by a walk towards the southern part of our domain: here we met Abel, as he was driving home his flock of goats, to pen them for the milking, and for the night. It was a goodly sight: upwards of a hundred were then just issuing from among the trees, beyond the open ground. As they approached, we observed a part of them run bleating before the rest towards the pen. The kids of these impatient ones, confined within the stoccado, hearing their mothers, now answered them with an incessant clamour; but the poor little urchins were destined still to baa till their dams had first submitted themselves to the hands of the milkers.

When we considered how many of these animals had been given to the settlers, it was surprising to behold such an offspring from the single pair that had been wrecked with us; the six she-goats subsequently brought from Jamaica, having been given away, so that no part of their progeny had increased our own flock. But now, perhaps, the total increase on the islands exceeded two hundred; none having been killed, up to the present time, one solitary kid excepted. Our poultry also was in excess. But the milk of the goats and the eggs of the poultry, if superabundant to ourselves, nevertheless found ample consumers among the women and children of the settlement. The pigs had become absolutely a nuisance: their numbers and their noise were insufferable; so that to diminish this noisy and noisome population, some were ordered to be killed from time to time, and served to the new settlers in lieu of salt provision. Having reflected on this survey of our stock, my dear wife requested that two dozen of geese, three dozen of ducks, and two dozen more of fowls, and twelve additional goats, might be divided among the Germans. I approved the proposal; and instructions were given to Abel on our return from our walk, to have them all in readiness on Saturday morning.

In consideration of the pressing works on hand, orders were issued, signifying that there would not be a muster on the morrow; but four of the Germans were to come over, nevertheless, for their supplies; one of whom was to be Hinklemann, besides the Flemish woman his wife. On Saturday morning, these people came; Hinklemann's wife soon after making her appearance at the mansion, where she received some special marks of favour; after which she was made to comprehend, for the information of her friends, what was going forward for the benefit of their settlement. The stock being then delivered to the men, the mode of distribution was correctly explained to her, and the party departed; well pleased to carry back agreeable tidings, and a welcome present of live stock to the people.

On Sunday the 31st, we all assembled under the silk-cotton tree to prayers, every person well dressed for the occasion, and an unexceptionable demeanour observed. After service, I remarked, that although the Germans had on clean clothes, their skins generally seemed far from clean. I suspected they had no soap, but on inquiry found this was not the case. I then thought fit to remonstrate with them on the subject. They complained that water was at a great distance, and that it was quite one person's business in each family, every day to fetch it. Now, this had been a great oversight in locating them; therefore, on hearing it, I took my wife aside, to advise with her on what could be done. She would not allow me to say they were a dirty people; adding, with her gentle disapproval of the charge, "that we should be so too, if we were deficient in water."—"But what is our remedy, dear Eliza?" said I; "they must be clean, cost what it may."—"Well, then," she replied, "get some asses from Jamaica, for the poor people to fetch their water; and meanwhile I will take the women aside with Rosalie, and talk over the matter; telling them, until the asses come, they must do as well as they can; but at any rate, they and their husbands and children must bathe in the sea, at least every Sunday morning, before coming to prayers." Having made this arrangement between ourselves, the Flemish woman was desired to say that something would speedily be done to remedy the inconvenience; after which, my dear Eliza, with Rosalie, took all the German women into the mansion, where, as it has been elsewhere expressed, "there was a grand palaver," and all things explained to their satisfaction.

By the middle of August, the school-room was finished; and Diego having completed his task rather sooner than he expected, had an opportunity of replenishing the turtle craal; and of doing many other things required at the cotton-tree plantation, where there was a fine growth of all the vegetable productions I had from time to time brought into the island.

On Monday the 15th, early in the morning, all the children were assembled in the school-room, to the number of thirty-three; at which meeting we took care to be present. It had been arranged that every child should bring a bag of provisions for its dinner; and we were glad to see that the rule was so judiciously complied with at the outset: we had also directed that a woman from each respective settlement should escort its children to school in the morning, remaining with them all day, to take them back in the evening. Hinklemann's wife was desired to perform this service for the first month; and during that month Rosalie was deputed to attend school with Mr. Rowley; and we had much pleasure in hearing Mrs. Gordon offer her services likewise. The instructors were now left to commence their labours; and my dear wife, with Mrs. Rowley, and Dr. Gordon, walked round to Peccary Field House, where we spent the day; and in the evening returned with our good pastor, and his family, and Rosalie, to the mansion.

The carpenters and bricklayer were again making the necessary preparations to commence Doctor Gordon's house; and on Wednesday they were fairly at work, with the addition of the sawyers, who rendered great assistance in cutting and squaring the timber.

About noon this day, Corporal Craig reported a vessel off the south channel. I went with him to the signal post on the promontory, taking with me the soldier on guard; the vessel was a galliot, lying to, with Dutch colours flying. Our colours were hoisted; and, on my return to the fort, a canoe was despatched for Doctor Gordon, whom I requested to accompany Diego in the six-oared boat to board her; the Avon being with the carpenters, and at this time full of planks. The boat stood out to sea under sail, and piloted the galliot in to the anchorage, a little before six in the evening. I put on my laced coat to receive the Dutch skipper, who soon came on shore. He told me his vessel was from Curaçoa, on a trading voyage; that he had called here to see what he could do, having heard of the place from a Spaniard. He spoke English tolerably well, and began to enumerate his cargo. I told him I had nothing to do with that, but desired to inform him, that "there were no harbour charges exacted here; that trade was free, excepting in spirits, wine, or beer, which could not be sold or landed without my permit." With this understanding, he retired with my brother's factotum, Doctor Gordon, to enter upon business: and I had little fear, novice as the Doctor might be in matters of this kind, that he would allow the Dutch skipper to over-reach him in a bargain. He was in possession of invoices and prices current, so that he knew what his own goods should fetch, and what he could afford to give the Dutchman for his.

Thursday and part of the next day were spent by the Dutchman and the Doctor in trading negotiations, but nothing had been concluded between them. I had in the meanwhile sent a turtle and some fish and vegetables to the crew, as an act of hospitality; for which they were thankful, and behaved very orderly. But it unfortunately happened that some of the Germans found their way on board the galliot, and as they could make themselves fully understood, they quickly discovered that there was Hollands Geneva on board; a few cases of which belonging to the crew, our new settlers as quickly laid out in the purchase of them, most of the money they had reserved of the Queen's gift; and contrived to take the liquor away, without the Captain's knowledge. The consequence was, that all the men at German Town got drunk, and went over to Peccary Field by the new-made road, in a very disorderly manner. A canoe was immediately despatched to me with the intelligence; on which I ordered Diego's boat to be manned; then putting Corporal Craig and the three soldiers on board the galliot, to keep possession of her till my return, I rowed with all possible haste to Peccary Field; and found the delinquents there, quarreling with the carpenters, who had come from their work on the Doctor's house, to endeavour to make the drunken men return home. By this time, some of the German women had come over, and they were sadly distressed at the scene. I sent Diego with two of his men, immediately to German Town, to break every bottle of the Hollands they could find; and, partly by entreaties and partly by force, I contrived to make eight of the delinquents return. Three were so drunk they could not now walk; and one had been so beastly so, before the rest set out, he could not accompany them. On Diego's re-appearance, he reported to have found three cases; the bottles of one were quite empty, and also five bottles in another. But he had broke the twelve full bottles, in the remaining case, and also the seven full ones left in the other; and he learned through Hinklemann's wife, who had now picked up a little English, that the men had paid three dollars for each case.

After setting this matter to rights in the best way I could, I desired all the carpenters to sleep that night at Peccary Field, to make Mrs. Seaward's mind easy. I then returned in the boat; and after landing, sent Diego to the galliot to bring the Captain on shore. On his arrival, I told him what had been done, in despite of my regulations, to the incalculable mischief of some of the people. He protested his innocence of the affair, and total ignorance of what had happened, until the soldiers were put on board; but said, he had since discovered that four cases of Hollands had been sold by his men, besides twenty pounds of tobacco; adding, that he was ready to make any atonement in his power. This was all, perhaps, that could be required of him. But I told him, the guilty persons must be punished. To this he made no objection; and accordingly the men who had sold the spirits and tobacco to the Germans, were ordered on shore. I spoke to them myself, telling them that as they had presumed to do this against the regulations of the place, their Hollands should be confiscated; and that they must return the money, for that which they had sold. The men instantly laid down the money for the Hollands, and also the amount for the tobacco; but I bade them take up the latter sum, as there was no order against the sale of tobacco. Just as the business had drawn to this point, Diego came in, to say the Porghee was standing in to the harbour with another schooner. Having now done with the skipper and his men, I ordered them on board; and sent word to Corporal Craig, to leave two of the soldiers in the vessel until the morning.

My beloved wife was exceedingly distressed at this affair. She felt that the Queen's honour was sullied by the conduct of her countrymen; and she feared that they might hereafter prove a source of disquietude to the settlement, and of repeated vexations to me. I said every thing in my power to assure her, that I considered the act as the result of barbarous ignorance, and not of a rebellious or vicious spirit; and that I already forgave it, although an appearance of displeasure would be required, and measures must be taken to prevent the recurrence of such an offence again.—“You are always kind and good,” returned my dear Eliza, “and I believe all you say; but still such an act leaves a stain behind it that never can be completely removed; and I should be doubly grieved, if anything so disgraceful to her people, were ever to come to the ears of the Queen. I think," continued she, "in looking into my own mind, it is for her Majesty, rather than for those ignorant boors, that I feel so sharply."

In the morning, the Doctor was sent to German Town, to see in what state the debauchees might be, so as to render them professional assistance if required. He took with him the twelve dollars, of which I mulcted the Dutch sailors, to be returned to the wives of the block-heads who gave it for gin. He recovered the fourth case full, which the women had hid away, and he brought it to me; at the same time giving an account of what he had seen and what he had done. I desired him to deposit the case by the side of his medicine chest, and draw on its contents medicinally, when any sick person might require it.

We were all glad to see our friend Drake again,—a fellow of sterling worth! being all, that he seemed,—honest, enterprising, and gentlemanly. He delivered his letters—not a few—from the Governor of Jamaica, and from the Commodore; one also from the Honourable Captain Townshend; others from my bankers in London, from my excellent father-in-law, and from my sisters, and uncle. There was much consequential matter in these communications, which at present I shall not notice. The Commodore had received the sword-handle, thankfully, in his way. Drake told me what he said; but I may not repeat it. However, the Porghee was repaired, and fitted out in the best manner; with a midshipman who had served his time as mate, and also with a youngster, besides a carpenter's mate, a boatswain's mate, and twelve men; and with six guns, four-pounders. This was more than was promised—more than I could have expected:

but the Commodore himself had taken the trouble to go on board; and having visited her, said, "she was a fine vessel, and deserved the equipment he would order." His letter was to the same purpose.

My brother visited the Dutchman on board his galliot, on the same evening of his arrival, notwithstanding the bruit he had occasioned, and the unpleasantness which still in some measure existed at Peccary Field. The Dutchman did not find the master so inflexible as his factotum had been; so they arranged for commencing business the next day; which was done to a considerable amount.—But I did not relax in keeping a guard on board the vessel; and such I made a standing order with respect to all traders that might hereafter enter the port.

On Sunday morning, the Dutchman sailed: that was his business, therefore I did not interfere; and, in truth, I was glad he was gone: for my brother had thought fit to purchase a quantity of Hollands and Rhenish wines from him, for which I could not refuse a permit; although, after what had happened, I was sorry he had done so. Some of the German men were too sick to appear at church; but they who came, expressed much contrition for their conduct. In the afternoon, Doctor Gordon returned with them to visit the settlement. He found three of the debauchees attacked with fever, and he wrote to me to that effect, but did not leave them. One of these, Rudolph Schnieder, died on the Tuesday following. The other two gradually recovered. On Wednesday, Mr. Rowley consecrated a piece of ground near to their town, in which the remains of the unhappy man were on that day deposited; all the colony being present, and the funeral service, devoutly performed. This was the first death that had taken place in the island: a sad mark for August, 1737.

Our letters, and the dismal occurrence that had just happened, occupied our attention during the present week. My brother, however, was engaged in landing his cargo brought down by his own schooner, the Tom Cod,—a fine New England vessel, well suited for commercial purposes—very different from the Porghee, which was less calculated to carry bulk, but more of a flyer.

In consequence of my letter from Governor Trelawney, in which he returned me many thanks for my superb present, I ordered Drake to hold himself in readiness to sail immediately for Bluefield's River, on the Mosquito shore, to treat with the chiefs there to supply two hundred Indians for the subjection of the Maroons at Jamaica. I quickly furnished him with instructions, and a copy of Governor Trelawney's letter; also gave him money to purchase twelve asses and two riding mules, with saddles and bridles for the latter, at the nearest Spanish port he could obtain them; and desired him, if possible, to procure a person that could teach our people to make Spanish plait and hats from the leaves of the palm-tree. He sailed on Thursday, the 25th, for Bluefield's River, which may be distant from Seaward Islands about one hundred leagues.

All the women of the settlement, besides all the men excepting the carpenters, were now employed in getting in and housing the second harvest, which was most abundant everywhere; and as the Germans had yet but little to do on their ground, for so many of them, they were engaged elsewhere as their services were required, for which they were paid a fair remuneration.

In less than three weeks Drake returned, bringing with him two Indian chiefs. He had also procured the asses and mules, with some awkward riding furniture, at a small Spanish port to the southward, called Alvos. He, however, failed in getting any one to teach us the straw manufactory, which the Spaniards only understand to perfection. I entertained the chiefs in the way I thought most agreeable to them; and by way of conciliating their respect, I presented each of them with a couple of doubloons, on taking their leave. Drake landed the asses and mules the very day he arrived; and next morning he sailed again for Jamaica, with the two chiefs, taking a letter from myself to Governor Trelawney; having no other commission than the purchase of two young new negroes, a man and a woman, for Doctor Gordon; which I desired him to do, that I might be enabled to fulfil my promise to the Doctor, when his house should be ready to receive him.

On the Saturday following, September 17th, a parade was held. The Germans had become more industrious than heretofore; and now seemed anxious, by their observance of cleanliness and every other regulation, to retrieve their character. After parade, I gave them to understand, that it had been my intention to stop their tobacco for three months, as a punishment for their late bad conduct: but I looked upon the death of their comrade, to which that conduct had been accessory, as a punishment from a higher power; therefore I should bury the whole affair in his grave, and behave to them as if nothing of the kind had happened. My dear wife shed a tear when she heard me say this, and turned aside.

On Monday, twenty-four pigs were selected for the Germans, as they were now in a condition to feed them; and six of the asses also were appropriated to their use. Two more were given to the soldiers, two sold to my brother, and two retained at the silk-cotton-tree plantation. The Reverend Mr. Rowley mounted his mule to-day, for the first time; taking his ride through the woodland region, and by the water's edge of the sandy isthmus, to the seat of his daily labour. Mrs. Gordon, as yet a guest at Peccary Field, still assisted him; but the services of Rosalie and the wife of Hinklemann, were no longer thought necessary.

Our Scotch grass, which grew luxuriantly to the height of from three to four feet in and about the water-run, that overflowed from the reservoir below the great tree, now came into use to feed our mules: the asses did not require such nutritious food; they would feed with the goats on the scantiest herbage.

Towards the end of this week we were thrown into great consternation, by the small-pox appearing on board my brother's schooner, in the person of Harry Rock, Anne's brother. The Doctor, highly approving the inoculation plan introduced from Turkey by Lady Wortley Montagu, immediately set about preparing all the people for it, both old and young, who had not experienced the disease. Every one under preparation was washed with soap and fresh water, then physicked for three days, then inoculated; and after three days more, when the arm showed signs of the inoculation having taken, they were made to bathe in the sea three times every day, until the pustules filled. These were then all pricked with needles, to let out the matter, and the patients again well purged, but not bathed. Much praise is due to Doctor Gordon, for his great judgment, and wise departure from the ordinary destructive practice in treating this hideous and fatal malady. In consequence, we did not lose a single individual. Yet poor Rock had a narrow escape, having been almost at the point of death. I may here remark, that the success of Gordon's practice was subsequently sent to Jamaica; but the chief of the faculty there, discountenanced the whole proceeding as empirical; and, consequently, few ventured to follow it.

This sickness among us, gave my dear wife and the other ladies enough to do, as well as the Doctor; but all that kindness could conceive, and humanity could bestow, was provided for the comfort of the people; and early in October every one was well, and all things going on in their usual routine.

Our friend Drake made his appearance on Friday, the 14th. He had met with a gracious reception from the Governor, from whom he brought me a letter of thanks. The Porghee had been again at the Mosquitto shore, where he had landed the two Indian chiefs, to make the required levy. He brought from them to me, a present of four beautiful deer, and eight fine turkeys of a peculiar breed. The breasts of these birds are of a deep orange colour, the wings and tail black, but the extreme ends of the wing and tail feathers are tipped with orange also; so that when the cock bird showed himself off in his pride, the expansion of his plumage exhibited the orange on the tail feathers as forming a golden iris. The commission I gave him for the purchase of the two young negroes, intended for Doctor Gordon, had been duly executed; and indeed, after the humane, skilful, and unwearied attentions of that gentleman, I was happy in the opportunity of presenting him with these useful domestics for a term of seven years; after which it was understood their labours would be their own, and themselves to all intents and purposes free. He received them thankfully; and being a man of an honest and good heart, expressed himself much pleased with the conditions of their servitude. "I am no friend to slavery," said he; "and if you please, Sir Edward, we will call the man William Wallace, and the girl Joan of Arc."—I cheerfully approved the nomination, falling in with the Doctor's patriotic whim. The beautiful deer were now turned out into the woodland region, where they had plenty of shade, and I may say a fine park to range in.

On Monday morning, Drake sent some of his men to spread an awning from tree to tree in the cocoa-nut grove, where we were to dine, and entertain all Mr. Rowley's scholars in the afternoon. As Drake was resolved to make it a day of pleasure, he requested to have the other mule, and ride over to the Black Rock with Mr. Rowley, early in the morning: "for," said he, "I have not crossed ass, horse, or mule, since the day you saw me show off in that way at Spanish Town."—A mule's usual pace suited the parson very well, who was content to go on quietly, but our friend Drake was desirous of a gallop, so by way of spurs he fastened a corking pin to the heel of one of his shoes, and made the jade feel it, just as they were setting off. The mule perhaps had belonged to some sober-minded friar, who being satisfied to eat and sleep, and most likely to take a nap, after eating, upon his mule, she was not accustomed to such a salutation; so in the moment she felt the pin, up went her heels, and in spite of the close Spanish saddle, threw the gallant sailor over her head. When I saw that he was not hurt, I could not help laughing; but my dear wife and Maria ran out immediately to his assistance, and the rogue, seeing this, kept his ground, that they might help him up. Poor Maria had screamed, and now she wept upon his neck. He did not intend, or expect this: he rose therefore quickly, saying, "Dear ladies—dear Maria, if I may call you so—this is too kind."—Maria was vexed at being so taken in: therefore turned away without reply, and came into the house. Drake quickly followed her; and after an interview of a few minutes, long enough to make up a lovers' quarrel, he returned, and remounted the mule; taking the precaution, however, to remove the pin from his heel. He and the parson then bid us adieu, and jogged on cosily together.

Mistress Rota furnished an ample repast, to take with us to the cocoa-nut grove; where we were to meet all my brother's family, including Doctor and Mrs. Gordon. Soon after twelve o'clock, I sent on Mr. and Mrs. Rowley and children, together with my sister and Rosalie, in Diego's boat; taking with them all the good things, and to say, we would follow. My dear wife and myself had a fancy in our heads, to realize which, was our object in remaining behind. I had desired Diego to get the old punt down to the rocky point, which he did. And after the party had gone, my dear Eliza dressed herself in the old island garb of our former days—boots, trousers, short tunic, and buntin sash, with a turbaned mouchoir on her head; I also dressed myself as in the habit of those times, with pistols and a hatchet in my belt, having the canteen with water, as formerly, slung over my shoulder. I gave my wife a pike in her hand, and then took up a basket, into which she had put a piece of salt beef and some biscuit, and likewise the old gaskets, for the occasion. We had religiously preserved these memorials of our early days. Then taking the hand of my beloved, followed by our faithful Fidele, who, after smelling to the end of the pike, and to our old leggings or gaiters, jumped about, frisking his tail, as if the old days of his prowess against the iguana were to be renewed again.

We bent our steps through the woodland region, where we soon became like those who are said to be under enchantment. Scarcely had the trees shut out every other object, than all that had passed since our earliest days here, appeared as a dream. "O Edward!" my wife exclaimed, "I am now indeed again quite happy!—do we dream?—or have we dreamt?—If we are now just awakened, all that seemed lately so real, then, is passed! But if it were only a dream, it had the full evil of life; for I suffered both cares and anxieties, and a painful estrangement from you!—Oh! it were enough, all these, even in a dream! But I fear ours has been, and is, one of those day-dreams, to end only with life."—She threw her arms upon my neck, and I knelt to receive the embrace, and the tear that her tender heart swelled to bestow upon me. This was a moment of too much bliss to last beyond a moment, but it was as the visit of an angel to the drooping spirit of man; it was the fountain in the wilderness; and soon we felt ourselves refreshed and joyous, following the path, till we passed the well-known spring and the rock. As in old times, I then placed her in the stern of the punt; followed by Fidele, leaping and skipping by her side, as in days of yore. The two scull oars were quickly in my hands, when cheerily I rowed along the beach, to the foot of the cocoa-nut grove.

Diego was the only person who knew us when we leaped on shore. He gave a great shout on seeing us, and fell on his face upon the ground. We were in the dress he first saw us in, when he and his hesitating friends prostrated themselves before me. Diego's conduct caused much commotion among our friends, for he quickly sprang up again, crying out, "Señor Don Edvardo!" and "La Señora Donna nuestra!"—This only increased their embarrassment, while we advanced with pike and basket, arm in arm, towards them. Rosalie was the first to perceive the dog, exclaiming, "Ah Fidele!" On reaching the astonished group, they appeared much amused by our appearance, as if in masquerade. But when Diego told his story, a deeper interest was excited; our dresses were examined with the most minute attention; the pike in my Eliza's hand, looked at over and over again; and even the punt, on which no eye hitherto had deigned to look, became an object of curiosity and respect.

The collation was already spread out. We desired our friends to sit down to it, but to permit us to dine as we had done in former days; promising to join them afterwards, when the children came. Our party had good feeling and good taste enough, to comply with our whim; and while they sat down to a sumptuous feast, under an extended canopy, my dear Eliza and myself retired to the ledge of rocks a little above them, where we spread out our simple fare. The capsicums she had sown with her own hands, were growing luxuriantly around us, so that we had no more to do but pluck one of them, to give a relish to the beef; but we now only pretended to eat, the keen relish was gone for such food; and perhaps if the experiment had been made of our lonely island being restored to us, we should have found ourselves equally disqualified for the enjoyment of that solitude, which our present little pageant was intended to recall and celebrate. When our friends had nearly dined, and were calling out to us to join them at their dessert, I took the gaskets from the basket, and, to their surprise, I ascended a cocoa-nut tree, and with my hatchet sent the fruit tumbling to the ground. Some of the party came to scramble for the nuts, while I gravely descended, and taking a couple under my arm, returned to my dear wife: I then clave these nuts, that she and I might drink; afterwards collecting the others that had fallen, into our basket, we presented them to our friends, and joined the party in their festivities.

The poor dear children made their appearance about three o'clock, and were delighted by the sight of so many good things. They were instantly placed round the remains of our rural feast, and made happy by the helping hands of all the party. Rosalie, who was a joyous sweet-tempered creature, soon after sung to her guitar; the children then danced, or attempted to dance; the ladies walked about; and looked on, while my friend Drake and myself lighted our cigars, and took post on the ledge of rocks above. My dear Eliza soon joined us there, chatting and looking on, delighted with seeing so many happy, and the more so by being where she was.

In the evening Diego was sent with his boat to take the German children home, to save them a long walk; but the others returned on foot. My brother, with his family, crossed over to Peccary Field with his boat; but to our other friends, a choice lay between the two mules, the punt, or a walk. I suggested that the parson should take up his own wife, and Drake should take up my sister, behind them on the mules, and go home. The ladies laughed at this joke of mine, for such it was; but excused themselves, saying they could not ride without a pillion. I then proposed that the whole party should walk; but Mrs. Rowley replied, she would like to go in the punt with her girls; and Maria expressed the same desire. "Very well, then, Drake," said I; "you may have the honour to row our Argos back: for, in my eyes, this humble craft is to us what the renowned Argos was in the eyes of the Greeks: and who knows but, Jason like, you may take with you in it a golden fleece." He instantly met the wish, but I think without perceiving the allusion I had made to my sister. The parson now gave the mules to Drake's midshipmen, who liked a ride as well as their captain; Mr. Rowley himself, and Mr.

Dilkes, choosing to walk. My dear Eliza and myself followed, once more treading the beach of the isthmus leisurely together, arm in arm; while Rosalie and Fidele kept behind us at a distance, amusing themselves with whatever presented itself on their way. "This has been a happy day, dear Edward," said my sweet angel, as we retired to rest. "Yes, my love, it has indeed been a happy day," I replied,—“a gleam of sunshine through the clouds of life.”

CHAPTER VII.

ON Thursday morning, the German look-out, on the northern height of George's Island, hoisted the Union Jack, as a signal for a sail; and nearly at the same time, Corporal Craig hoisted his colours on the promontory, with a gun; and, soon after he made his appearance, to report two sail in the offing. I did not know what this might mean; having lately had accounts of very unfriendly, not to say hostile, proceeding on the part of the Spaniards towards the commerce of England; accompanied by that insolent and menacing conduct, which left little doubt of war between the two countries, being near at hand: and as my position might be deemed the outpost, in our West Indies, I could not tell how soon we might be attacked. I therefore ordered the bugle to sound; and, like the Scottish clans of the year 1715, our people quickly came to the gathering. Drake got the Porghee under weigh, and stood out to the southward; while Dilkes, with the Tom Cod's crew in the Avon, sailed through the northern channel, taking the precaution to be armed. My caution proved to be unnecessary on this occasion; but caution, like secrecy, is a friend that seldom will betray you; and therefore, though not always wanted, should never be disregarded.

The strangers soon came in, and anchored. My uncle's brig, the Mary, and a Spanish merchant schooner, were the two vessels seen from the promontory; and the other, the most important, was a king's cutter from Jamaica, with despatches to me from the Governor and the Commodore.

Our old friend, Captain Taylor of the Mary, was delighted at seeing the improvement of our settlement, and the respectable appearance of our military guard: but he did not much like a soldier being put on board his vessel; which, however, he cheerfully acceded to, when I told him what had happened, and that it had become, in consequence, a standing regulation of the port; another sentinel, at the same time, being stationed on board the Spaniard.

The Commodore's despatches contained an admiralty confirmation of the admission of the Porghee on the list of the navy; and with it, a confirmed commission for Lieutenant Francis Drake, now appointed by the Lords Commissioners to the command of that vessel;—an event highly gratifying both to Drake and myself.

But the letters from the Governor were of serious and immediate importance: they went, to state the horrible depredations committed on our trade generally, by the Spaniards in the West Indies; expressing a wish that I would go to Portobello in my yacht, accompanied by H. M. cutter Seagull, and, in the name of the British government, demand restitution of two ships, with mahogany and logwood, captured off Cozumel by an armed vessel belonging to Porto Bello, and reported to have been brought to that port. After some private conversation, first with my dear wife, who was to me what the Czarina had been to Peter; and then with Drake, my excellent captain; I determined to sail without loss of time, on the business confided to me, and fixed Saturday for our departure. My Eliza then entreated me to take her along with me, saying, “It is a civil mission, Edward; therefore I hope it may not be improper for me to accompany you.” I appreciated this kind and meek appeal to my feelings and understanding; so without hesitation I consented to do so, expressing, at the same time, the happiness her request had given me. I must now do Drake the justice to observe, that on my communicating to him my business at Porto Bello, he said,—“It is not likely that vessels taken off the island of Cozumel, should be brought to Porto Bello: however,” continued he, “I have no business to think about it; my business is to obey orders.” So saying, he left me, to get the Porghee ready for sea.

Some English presents were put on board, for the Governor of Porto Bello:—half a dozen hams, two immense Gloucester cheeses, one hundred weight of double refined sugar, and three hampers of London porter. All necessary arrangements being completed, we sailed early on Saturday forenoon; my wife taking with her Rosalie, who, she thought, possibly might be of use to us in transacting any written official business with the Spaniards; for, as I have before stated, this girl was a good French scholar. I would have taken honest Diego with me too, but was afraid, lest they might seize him as soon as he was discovered to be a Spanish negro; for we all knew right well, they were not very nice about laying hands on anything, or anybody, to which they could advance the shadow of a claim.

On Sunday, at noon, we made the island of St. Andero, which lay in our way; and, about two o'clock, stood in on the west side, upon pretence of desiring a pilot for Porto Bello, and anchored outside the reef: but my real design was to see a place not fifty leagues distant from our own settlement—and a wretched place it appeared to be, as far as we could discern with our glasses,—cannon without carriages, soldiers without appointments; two monasteries, but no fortification worth a rush; and a miserable-looking population; with no trade, but a guarda costa lying in the roads. This fellow was far from courteous: we had no sooner anchored, than he sent a boat on board, in which there was a man who spoke tolerable English, a native of Gibraltar; and through whom he gave us to understand, we must not anchor there; that he had orders, not to allow any English vessels, whatever, to come within what he pleased to call the Spanish jurisdiction. I told him in reply, that these vessels not only belonged to the King of England, but that I was going on a mission from the British government to the Governor of Porto Bello; and, being strange to the coast, we wanted a pilot. "Then," said he, "you may want a pilot: for the King of Spain does not desire to see any of you in his seas; and if you do not take my warning, and go back, perhaps the Governor may send the crews to hard labour, and the Cabalero's officers to Gloria Castle!" If our two vessels had not overawed this hidalgo, I think it not unlikely he would have proceeded to still ruder measures. After a few hours we weighed, and steered for Porto Bello, leaving the guarda costa at his anchor.

On Wednesday, 26th of October, about ten o'clock in the forenoon, we made Punta Gorda, and worked up nearly all day for Porto Bello, to the northward and eastward, against a strong current. None but strangers to the coast would have made this mistake; in consequence of which we could not get in that night, but by the morning we were off the high land to the northward of the port. The vessels had been seen during the previous day, and our colours had declared what we were. Early in the morning, an armed boat with an officer was despatched to us, as we lay becalmed under the land. This officer spoke French, so that I readily made him understand who I was, stating my business. He said we must remain where we were, till he went in and returned. About ten o'clock he appeared again, accompanied by another officer of superior rank. This officer, whose name is too long to write (the name of the governor being long enough), said that "his Excellency Don Francisco Martinez de Retez desired that I should communicate my business to him, who would then impart it to his Excellency." I told him in reply, to go back to his Excellency Don Francisco Martinez de Retez, and tell him, that a man, not inferior to himself in rank and fortune, and equal to him in honour with his sovereign, was here; and that in consequence of his message, I should send the cutter into the port, with a letter to demand an audience; at the same time signifying to the officer, that he might, if he chose, go in the cutter. He, however, declined the honour I intended him, saying he did not know whether his Excellency was aware of what I had told him; but that he had only obeyed the orders he had received; adding, that he thought it might be well to allow him time to return and explain the matter to the governor, before I sent in the cutter, lest any mischief should come out of it. I replied, that I would lay to another hour, the breeze having now set in; but at the expiration of the hour, if due respect was not paid to my representation, the cutter should go in; as it was the right of every ship or vessel belonging to his Britannic Majesty so to do; but that my coming in person, or not, would depend on the conduct of the governor of Porto Bello on the occasion. In about an hour, another boat was seen coming off, and I awaited her arrival. She brought no message, but put a pilot on board each of our vessels, and we instantly made sail, and stood into the harbour. It had been agreed that the cutter should fire a salute, on passing the fort on our larboard hand; but not the schooner, lest the Spaniard might not choose to return it: and so it fell out.

A letter, written in English and in French, was now despatched to his Excellency, requesting an interview at his earliest possible convenience. And, that I might fall as little short as possible of Spanish pomp, I gave my name and titles at full length : on which occasion, for the first time in my life, I reflected on my godfathers, that they had not given me two or three names besides Edward ; to have made me somewhat on a par in that way with his Excellency of Porto Bello. I intrusted this letter to Drake, desiring him to deliver it to the governor with his own hand.

Soon after he went on shore, a boat with soldiers came alongside of each of our two vessels, and the soldiers, very unceremoniously, were preparing to step on board. The cutter was the first to perceive their intention, while the boats were yet at a distance ; on which Captain Thomson hailed the Porghee, to know how he should act. “ Do not allow it,” was my reply. The crews of the vessels then seizing their boarding pikes, prepared to repel the intruders. The Spanish officer, on finding he could not put his order into execution without violence, drew off and returned.

In the course of the afternoon, I received a reply from his Excellency, written in Spanish and in French. It was prolix, being replete with unmeaning compliment ; but he could not, he said, appoint any time for an interview, until he knew the purport of it. A Spanish officer, who came back with Drake, delivered this note, by whom I returned a pretty sharp answer :—“ If his Excellency should refuse an interview with an officer, who came as chargé d'affaires from the British government, it must be considered as an insult to the Crown of England ;” and I desired to know what he meant by attempting to send Spanish soldiers on board his Britannic Majesty’s vessels.

The time was, and not many months ago, when I should have feared to incur the displeasure of my government, and receive a reprimand, for thus upholding the honour of my country; but I now knew that his Majesty had made up his mind, in spite of Sir Robert Walpole, to take hostile steps against the Spaniards, if they persisted in their aggressions and insults; I was therefore induced to follow the bent of my own feelings on this occasion. The Spaniard, however, had been too long accustomed to lord it over us, to care anything for my threat; nor did he deign to make any explanation respecting the attempt to put soldiers on board. I must confess I felt excessively chagrined at the haughty and contemptuous conduct observed towards us; and not a little vexed also at having failed completely in my mission. My Eliza perceived my vexation, and regretted that it was a case in which kindness from her could give but little consolation.

We remained nearly two days without receiving any further communication from the governor. In this interval we had learned, by a piece of paper given to one of the midshipmen while on shore with the boat, that there were five masters of English vessels, and one merchant and his wife, confined in a small tower about four leagues to the southward of Porto Bello, not half a mile from the shore. This information seemed to give me new energies, so that I immediately sat down and wrote again to the governor, stating what had come to my knowledge, and demanding that the people should be immediately given up; referring him to his instructions from the king of Spain, bearing date January 10th, 1732, wherein he was directed "not to molest nor abuse, nor suffer to be molested nor abused, by any of his Catholic Majesty's subjects, the English, or any of their ships;"

and I desired to know whether I was to understand that he refused the interview I had requested, on behalf of my master the King of England. To this communication, he replied, "that the people incarcerated, had been caught trading within the Spanish seas without a license; and that the vessels therefore had been condemned, and the people put in confinement: that he found this exception, in the circular to governors, to which I had referred, and, therefore, he would not give up the English demanded. And as he thought it would be acceptable to the king his master, not to give encouragement to English ships of any kind, or on any pretence to allow them to come into the ports of Spanish America, I had permission to depart as soon as I might think proper." This was enough. I had received my dismissal; and with it a general answer to the requisition I had come to make, which, of course, included the two particular captures I had been sent to represent, and for which I was to ask restitution. His Excellency Don Francisco Martinez de Retez had settled the business on which I came, without knowing it. But he was, moreover, ignorant of the good English fare he had missed, by his abominable conduct, and also of what was to follow.

On receiving my dismissal, no time was lost in getting the vessels under weigh, and we stood out to sea. The sea breeze soon died away after we got clear of the port; and as we lay becalmed, a canoe came alongside in the middle watch of the night, from point Cocal, with three English sailors and the master of a brig, which had been taken some weeks ago by the Spaniards. It was the master himself who had sent the note to us, having trusted it to a woman, to whom he gave his only shirt for taking it. Drake called me up, the moment these people came on board, who soon gave me every particular respecting the persons incarcerated ; and the situation, and slightly guarded state of the place of their confinement. I instantly determined to release our unfortunate countrymen, if possible, and speedily sent for the commander of the cutter, to confer with Drake and myself on the measure. It was soon settled. A boat from each vessel, well armed, were to go in ; that the business might be done effectually and at once, before any alarm could be excited ; Drake and Thomson volunteering to go themselves on the expedition. Drake took the master of the captured brig, and one of his men with him ; the other man going in the Seagull's boat, the canoe in which they came being now set adrift. About three o'clock in the morning, a light breeze came off the land, when the vessels were enabled to stand along shore to the south-west, in the track of the boats. During this time, one and all of us suffered under the greatest anxiety for the fate of our adventurers as well as for the daring adventure itself, it being altogether an irregular proceeding ; so that failure, and capture of our brave fellows, would certainly be visited by barbarous severity on the part of the Spaniards ; and by a pitiless condemnation, from our own government. But when the day dawned, we were relieved from our fears ; the boats were seen a little distance from the shore, pulling towards us, now again lying becalmed ; and by the help of the glass we could discern several persons with them, beyond their own number. On making this discovery, we rejoiced in the success of the generous undertaking, and the boats reached us just as the sea breeze set in. The whole party of strangers were then put on board the Porghee ; and without loss of time both vessels filled, and stood to the northward, lying their course for Seaward Islands.

Five masters of merchantmen, one supercargo, and a

Dutch merchant and his wife, had been rescued. The accounts these people gave of the barbarous treatment they had experienced at the hands of the Spaniards, were shocking to civilized society; and the circumstances under which they had been taken, and their vessels condemned, would have been an outrage against the independence and dignity of the lowest power in Europe.

If Seaward Islands had not lain directly in the track to Jamaica, I should not have determined to go there in the first instance; being desirous of furnishing government with the mass of evidence now in my possession against the Spaniard, without delay. But as a copy of my correspondence with the governor of Porto Bello would suffice to show the feeling that existed, practically exemplified by the appearance of persons rescued from an imprisonment inflicted in the face of treaties and political justice, I did not consider it requisite to go myself to Jamaica; therefore I had determined to land at our own place, and send the Seagull forward with my despatches.

We arrived at our own anchorage, on Wednesday, the 2d of November; and I instantly set about writing my despatches, while the poor unfortunates were invited on shore, and supplied with clothing, and all other necessities. The Dutchman and his wife seemed much distressed, and the account they gave of themselves was this:—They had got together some little property at Bonaire, with which they intended to return to Amsterdam, and retire. But a great part of it being in European goods, taken in payment for debts, the unlucky fellow conceived a plan of making a voyage to the Spanish Main, to a place where a smuggling business was carried on between the Spaniards and the Dutch; but although he succeeded there in converting much of his goods into dollars, he was laid hold of on the sea by a guarda costa, and the sequel we know. This man's name was Van Kempen, and a very honest fellow he was: his wife, also, was of a better order of Dutch women; and seeing their forlorn condition, without money and without resources, my ever kind Eliza proposed to me to offer them an asylum, until they could communicate with their friends, and see their way to the next step in life. This unfortunate couple received our offer with much thankfulness, declaring it would be a second saving of them, to allow them to remain with us. The three rescued seamen not being at all necessary at Jamaica, or in England, to the proving of the case, were also induced to remain with us, and ship themselves in my brother's schooner; this accession enabled me to take out the two lads, and Martin, to be permanently attached to the Avon. On Thursday, the Seagull sailed for Jamaica, well supplied with turtle and vegetables; taking on board the five masters, the supercargo, and my despatches for the Governor and Commodore.

There had not been any fighting, in rescuing the prisoners from the tower in which they were confined. Our fellows caught the guards napping, whom they awoke with three cheers: the Spanish soldiers took to their heels, as soon as they could get upon their legs; and so weak was the outer door of the place of confinement, that one of the seamen literally made a breach in it, something in the same way that the lion treated the knight of La Mancha.

Notwithstanding the happy result of our expedition, in rescuing our imprisoned countrymen, and the exultation it occasioned generally amongst us, yet I could not help continuing to feel much chagrined at the insulting conduct of the Spanish Governor, and at my total failure in accomplishing the object of my mission. My dear Eliza observed this with deep regret, and took every opportunity to satisfy my mind, that there had been nothing wanting on my part; that if the King's ministers had shown half the zeal and firmness in preserving the honour of the crown, that I had done on the late occasion, the insults, which I was now so deeply lamenting, never could have occurred. "And, indeed, my dear Edward," continued she, "I do say it in honesty, that you did all a man could do under existing circumstances; for which circumstances you are in no way responsible." In this way she would talk to me day after day, whenever she perceived me brooding over the subject. At length, she completely succeeded in her endeavours to compose my mind, and set my feelings at rest respecting it.

In a few days, I turned my attention to the affairs of the settlement. Doctor Gordon's house was finished, and he had commenced moving his furniture and other things from the storehouse, which he had brought out with him from England. My brother being now about to send his vessel to Jamaica, with the merchandise he had obtained from the Dutch trader and Spaniard, I sent an order by it for lumber, and other building materials, as much as she could carry. The Doctor's family having now left Peccary Field, my brother very kindly received Mr. Van Kempen and his wife, to take up their abode with him; and he found in these strangers useful, if not agreeable, inmates. The husband spoke English quite intelligibly, and possessed great knowledge of commercial affairs, as connected with this part of the world especially; and, moreover, the wife being a notable woman, and a resident for many years in the West Indies, instructed Mrs. Seaward in many things of no small importance as to the management of her house, and the produce of the grounds. Our new Dutch friend was of great use to me, too, not only in communicating with the Germans, but also in pointing out the best modes of directing their industry. He soon made himself master of our situation, and saw the great commercial advantages to be derived from it. He was frank, but respectful, in his communications; and ventured to say, that if there were more merchants there would be more trade. My brother, however, would not agree to this proposition, and at no distant period began to look on the Dutchman with a jealous eye. But his arguments were nevertheless convincing to my mind; and as I felt certain that my brother's success in life could not be injured, I resolved to give a facility to every person that chose to embark in trade, or in any other business, except tavern-keeping, at the settlement.

Van Kempen approved entirely of my project to establish a manufactory for straw hats from the palmetto; and he suggested, also, the cultivation of the Indian arrow-root, as there were fine runs of water to prepare the flour from it, which brings a great price in Europe. And besides, he was sure the German sausage-maker could make capital sausages of the turtle, if he were well supplied with spices; and if these were packed in jars, or small casks well covered with lard, they would sell not only in Europe, but even in the West Indies. So by these means, and others which afterwards would present themselves, he thought the industry of the people might be made relevant to the original stock of the island, and some wealth, however little, acquired. But without resorting to this principle, he said, whatever the people gained, I or my brother must lose. The Dutchman evidently understood his subject; and, therefore, notwithstanding the reluctance of my brother, whose views were narrow, only for want of knowing better, I determined to be guided in all my measures by the principles which had been so wisely stated and explained.

Our Sabbaths continued to be duly kept, our muster days observed, the school regularly attended, and the people daily occupied in their respective callings and avocations. When my brother's schooner returned, the carpenters and bricklayers were set to work on the house I had planned on the northern part of Allwood's Bay. Drake had twice visited the Spanish Main, near to Cape Gracias a Dios; and during the second time, succeeded in procuring a family who understood, in perfection, the making of plait, and fine hats, from the leaves of the palm-tree; and when he brought them to us, they were accompanied by a large supply of the material which he had collected, but of which we had an abundance on our own islands. The vessels of the colony were laid up in Peccary Creek during the short period of the stormy season; and after the rain ceased, the whole strength of the settlement was engaged in putting in roots and seeds for the ensuing harvest. Spanish vessels arrived now and then with merchandise, and dollars, of which my brother made a good account. Van Kempen kept the German women at work, with their wheels and distaffs, spinning cotton; by which more thread was furnished than our weaver could consume at his loom. At the school-house, the time of the children was divided between learning to read, and learning the straw work. Besides these new matters, a considerable quantity of the "Arundo Indiana radice esculente" was planted in January; and also an apparatus made, consisting of boxes, communicating with each other by hallow bamboos, to be ready when the plant should attain maturity, to convey the water to wash the grated root, and to receive the amylaceous deposit which constitutes that rare article called Indian arrow-root. Thus a system of general industry was instituted, and, at no distant period, carried into productive operation.

On the 10th of February 1738, we received the melancholy intelligence of the death of our most excellent and amiable Queen; which was communicated by a letter to my dear wife, from Lady Sundon. I will not attempt to describe the affliction this information occasioned. It was a day of sorrow I never can forget.

In March, the house at Allwood's Bay was finished. In the contemplation of its completion, I had sent the Porghee to Jamaica; and as furniture is not merchandise, I then requested Drake "to bring me such things as I thought I should require for this my intended country château!" On his return, the house was put in order, with all the neat and convenient furniture he had brought; and, when all was completed, I took him over with me to Allwood's Bay, to look at it. We both admired the situation in which it was placed,—the front looking towards the sea,—having a screen of finely wooded hills forming the background, as if to shelter it from the January storms. "Indeed, Sir Edward," said Drake, after we had gone through the halls and other rooms, "I think you will like this place so much better than the mansion at the fort, that you will make it your constant residence." — "I don't think that is likely, my dear friend," I replied; "but at home we shall hear what some one else may say on the subject." We returned to dinner, and my Eliza met us in the piazza. Drake began a eulogy to her on the château, the moment we came in. "I am well pleased," she replied, "to hear that you are so much delighted with the place, and I am not the only one that will feel happy in your being so." This was a puzzler for Drake. "I am at a loss, Sir Edward," said he, looking earnestly at me, and perhaps somewhat astounded, "to make a reply to my friend Lady Seaward, for she is not used to pay compliments."—"She means what she says, my dear friend," I rejoined; "she and I are both happy that you are delighted with the place. The house was built and furnished for you, and not for us; and I desire you will accept it as a mark of our regard." His surprise now increased his perplexity, so that for some time he was unable to make any reply. At last, he stammered out, "My friend! my dear friend!"—then rallying a little, smiled, and added, "your great kindness has given me courage to ask a favour."—But here again his courage failed, and he could say no more. But my kind-hearted Eliza took up his theme for him.—"You would say," added she, taking him kindly by the hand, "I should not only wish to call you friend, but brother!"—"Is that the case, my dear Drake?" I exclaimed, "Is this the favour that so much embarrasses you to express? If you and another person desire it as much as we do, there will be no impediment; and I believe you may be happy." The brave and tender heart is seldom severed. The gallant Drake could not restrain the tear that now glistened in the sunshine of his eye. My dear wife made no delay in communicating the subject of our interview to Maria, and had the happiness to add another joyful heart to the present hour.

On Sunday, the 19th of March, the nuptials were performed by the Reverend Mr. Rowley; after which, three couple of our domestic negroes were married; and several black children baptized, besides all the adult people who had not undergone the rite of baptism. The whole population was entertained in the afternoon with flour cakes and coffee, and cigars. After which, the happy couple, attended by Rosalie for the occasion, and two of my wife's domestic women, Clara and Hebe (whom she desired my sister to consider in future as her own servants), were rowed over to their residence, by Master Diego in his barge; which he requested to be permitted to have the honour of doing, rather than allow it to be done by the white sailors of the yacht.

In the course of the week, visits of congratulation were made. And my dear wife sent a supply of goats, and poultry of every kind, to the château to stock the place. I now thought this a fit time, though out of the ordinary course of doing such things, to tell Drake what I intended to give my sister, now his wife. And I gave him a memorandum, whereby I engaged myself to settle 2500*l.* upon her and her children, with the usual conditional provisions. "And now, Drake," said I, "you and your wife will have to sign this instrument, as well as myself, by and by, when it is drawn up agreeably to legal forms: but you may perceive, I hereby give you nothing, excepting that I enable your wife to pay her mess."—"And a very good mess" he replied, "it will enable us to keep, with my pay, and the Penn; for all which you are entitled to her husband's best thanks, at least."—"That is very well, on your part, my dear friend," I replied, "but not enough on mine:—you want two or three young negro men to keep your grounds in order, and I have none to spare you; and there are many other things you will need, notwithstanding all that has been done for you."

On an early day, when Drake and his wife came to take a family dinner with us, I called to my Eliza, as she and my sister, Mrs. Drake, were talking together in the piazza. "Do you think, dearest," said I, "you can find five hundred dollars for Drake, to set him up in the world?"—"Yes," she replied, "a thousand, if you wish it."—"That's well," I exclaimed; "bring them forth, if you can carry so many, and he shall have the thousand—a joint present from us to our gallant friend, on this happy occasion." Drake bowed, but said not a word; and walked into the piazza to his wife. When the bag of dollars was put upon the table, I called them in, and gave it to him, with the best wishes of my dear wife and myself, for his prosperity and happiness. My sister kissed me, and, in a broken voice, thanked me for what I had done for her. At this moment my brother James came in. "Just in the nick of time, brother!" said I; "fellow this bag, if you please, with some of your Spaniards' dollars: it is a wedding present from us to Drake."—"I cannot afford to give as much as you, brother," he replied: "if I give half that you do, I think I shall not do amiss."—"I do not desire you to do so much," I rejoined.—"O yes," returned he, "I shall have no objection to give half what you do."—"I do not desire that you should do that, dear James," rejoined our sister; "for Edward has settled 2500*l.* on me for my portion; and this bag of dollars is a present to my husband." On hearing this, James felt himself in somewhat of a dilemma, endeavouring to extricate himself, by saying he would pair the bag; but Drake declined accepting it, saying, he already had quite enough; and his pertinacity in the business exceeded that of my brother, so nothing more was done; but we endeavoured, notwithstanding, to pass the day in good feeling, and with some little hilarity.

The society of Mr. and Mrs. Rowley, and their two dear little girls, was so agreeable to us that we could not desire to part with them ; and they being perfectly contented with their situation in the mansion, the building of a parsonage-house was yet deferred. In the interval of time I allowed to pass without making a daily record of occurrences, many minor arrangements had been made and carried into execution : among which is an extensive circular shed, covered with thin boards, extending forty feet every way, put up by the carpenter and seamen of the Porghee, around the base of the great silk-cotton tree ; radiating from the trunk of the tree at an elevation of fourteen feet, and terminating at its circumference, at an elevation of eight feet, resting on thirty-two wooden pillars, answering to the thirty-two points of the compass. And it was under this magnificent canopy, that the people were regaled on the celebration of my sister's marriage.

By the advice of Van Kempen, some houses were to be built between the barricado and the spring, so as to come close upon the woodland region. There were to be twenty in all, and to front each other, intended to form a street ; ten of which were to be placed with their backs to the west face of the promontory, and ten with their backs to the black rock ; leaving a space of sixty feet wide between their fronts ; the street to extend four hundred feet. These houses were intended for shops and such like, and to be built on a small but convenient scale. And without demurring on the matter one way or other, the eight carpenters and two sawyers, and the bricklayer and his apprentice, were set to work under the superintendence of our Dutch friend, to accomplish, as speedily as might be, this somewhat formidable undertaking. Indeed, my brother had become tired of Van Kempen and his wife, so that they were glad to look forward to the occupancy of the first of the houses that might be finished.

Early in April, Drake sailed for Jamaica with the yacht, and took his wife with him. In less than three weeks he returned, having purchased two negro men and two girls. He brought letters from the Governor, and others also from England. My friend Commodore Gunman had been recalled, and in his stead Commodore Brown was appointed to the command on the Jamaica station.

Our affair at Porto Bello had become a matter of public importance; but the parties concerned in it, I mean the two naval officers and myself, narrowly escaped the most consummate disgrace. The arrival in England of the rescued captains, happened just at the time when the whole country was pouring in petitions to parliament and to his Majesty, complaining of the outrages of the Spaniards. At this crisis, Sir Robert Walpole was doing every thing in his power to smother the complaining voice of the people, by throwing doubts on the truth of the many representations that were set forth by the petitioners. Therefore, when these rescued prisoners arrived, the minister was desirous of keeping them out of the way. But the Secretary of State being obliged to lay before his Majesty the Governor of Jamaica's letter, which comprised within it a copy of mine to him, containing a report of all that had passed at Porto Bello, the King's attention became fixed on that point, in spite of Sir Robert's shuffling to divert it, and he ordered the five masters, and the supercargo, to be examined before a committee of the Privy Council. The result of this examination led to measures of strong remonstrance on the part of our government to the Court of Spain; and to do the Duke of Newcastle justice, he was glad of it. But this only made the Prime Minister more angry with me, calling me a rash and obstinate blockhead: he also seized an opportunity to advise his Majesty to appoint

Colonel Hervey to the government and command of my islands; and at the same time took occasion to request permission, to instruct the Lords of the Admiralty to order Lieutenants Thomson and Drake to be tried by a court-martial. The King, however, indignantly refused to do either of those things; saying, "If I could do this, sir, Philip may very soon spit in the face of my ambassador, for his pastime! But no one shall hurt Seaward! no one shall hurt Drake; no one shall hurt Thomson! All men! Sir Robert Walpole, all brave men! and I speak for them."—This information came to me from Lord Harrington, who was present at the interview. And he further stated in his letter to me, that when Sir Robert retired, the King spoke to him (Lord Harrington) on the subject; on which the noble lord reminded his Majesty, that I was the person whom her late Majesty had knighted. On hearing this, the King called Walpole "Dog!" and expressed great indignation at the persecution intended us.

Yet, notwithstanding the royal favour, the Governor of Jamaica had received a reprimand, through the Secretary of State, for sending the mission to Porto Bello; and I had the honour of a similar state compliment, for what I had done there. I was much vexed at this business; and I confess, if I had not received, with the official letter, the kind and friendly communication from the noble Harrington, the affair would have occasioned me serious distress of mind.

After the rainy season in May had come to a close, and the consequent cultivation finished, I resolved to go to Jamaica, to have a conference with the Governor; and hastened to make all necessary arrangements, for carrying forward the works of industry and improvement, in my absence. Drake, in consequence, received orders to hold himself in readiness; being desired to lay in a good sea-stock, and not to neglect taking on board some English fare for presents; such as had been vainly carried with us to Porto Bello, as I intended to touch at St. Domingo, as well as at Curaçoa. For although I knew foreigners now began to despise us for submitting to the insolence of Spain, yet I had reason to believe that our flag was still sufficiently respected, both by French and Dutch, to secure at least a courteous reception to a person of any pretensions, holding a commission from the King of England.

As I proposed visiting Curaçoa before my return, Van Kempen requested to accompany me. My sister Drake also was to be of the party, as we had some business to do at Jamaica, in which she was the person specially concerned. With these, and my dear wife, and her fille de chambre, leaving Fidele with Mrs. Rowley, we embarked on the 5th of June, after having devoted the previous day to a more than ordinary devout observance of the Sabbath, the blessed sacrament having been received by us, and all others of the colony, who were deemed capable of comprehending its import and comfort.

Nothing can be more agreeable than being at sea in this climate, at this season of the year; and the superior manner in which the vessel was now tacked, and otherwise managed, by the white seamen, added to the pleasantness of the voyage. Not being pressed for time, we kept the open sea, speaking several vessels for our pastime; so that we did not make Jamaica till the ninth day.

At noon the yacht anchored off Port Royal. The Shark was there, and Captain Townshend immediately paid me a visit. We soon talked over all the Porto Bello business. He censured his uncle freely, saying—a general disgust was felt on the subject of the reprimand sent out from England. He was highly delighted, however, when I told him what the King had said, although I would not tell him how it came to my knowledge. "Let me repeat this to Lieutenant Thomson, when he comes into port?" cried he; "it will be worth a galleon to the poor fellow, for he fears his promotion is stopped."—"Do it," said I, "and welcome."

On Wednesday, we anchored off Greenwich, and paid our respects to the new Commodore; proceeding afterwards to Kingston. Here an attorney was quickly set about preparing the deeds for my sister's settlement. Then leaving Drake to take care of his man-of-war, I and my dear wife, with his wife, and our handmaid Rosalie, paid a visit to Spanish Town, where we were most kindly received by the Governor and his lady.

During the few days I remained, Mr. Trelawney and myself discussed pretty freely the conduct of the minister, on the late business at Porto Bello; also his general pusillanimous conduct with respect to the Spaniards. His Excellency was well pleased to hear the King's sentiments respecting myself and the naval lieutenants who were implicated in the late affair; to which he gave implicit credence, although I could not disclose my authority. He said, laughing,—“That is just the King's way.” When I repeated, “Nobody shall hurt Seaward; nobody shall hurt Drake; nobody shall hurt Thomson;”—“That is so like his Majesty,” continued Mr. Trelawney, “that no one could mistake it.” In the course of conversation, my dear wife and Mrs. Trelawney frequently lamented over the memory of our excellent Queen; of whom the Governor's lady told many anecdotes, that were highly to her honour. While I was here, I saw the two Indian chiefs from the Mosquitto shore, who had returned with two hundred Indians, to assist in putting down the Maroons. I thanked them for the present of the deer and turkeys, and made the more substantial acknowledgment, of presenting each of them with some money. Before I took leave of the Governor, I requested him to procure three artillery-men, as gunners to the fort at Seaward Islands; and a drum and a fife also, that is, a drummer and a fifer for the train-band; all of which he kindly promised to do, on the return of the yacht, whenever that might be. And having received letters from him, to the Commandant at Cape François in St. Domingo, and to the Governor of Curaçoa, we took our leave, much pleased by his attention and great kindness.

On our return to Kingston, the deeds of settlement were executed: making Mr. Perry, and my brother, trustees for Mrs. Drake. I now wrote a letter to the former, informing him of the circumstance, desiring him to lay out 2500*l.* in government four per cent. annuities, in his name, and the name of Mr. Seaward, for her benefit; and having written the letter, I showed it to Drake, and with his consent the deeds and the letter were forwarded to Mr. Perry.

We sailed again on the 20th, and beat to windward for several days, making Cape Tiberoon in St. Domingo on Sunday the 25th; and on Friday we had the pleasure of coming to an anchor at Cape François, having seen the most beautiful scenery that can be imagined, as we stood along shore. The fortifications were imposing; and the town, which stands on the starboard hand, looked well. There were many vessels at anchor off the town, besides three line-of-battle ships, and several smaller ships of war, at anchor beyond it.

I sent Drake on shore with my letters; from which mission he soon returned, accompanied by an officer of rank, and a polite invitation from the Commandant. I made my visit without the ladies, attended only by Drake; and as I went in uniform, we were received with an officer's guard, a drum, and presented arms. I confess I was highly gratified with this reception from the French, especially after the insulting treatment I had received from the Spaniards.

On the following morning, the Commandant returned my visit; and as we had no guard to receive him, he was saluted with thirteen guns from the yacht, which, after a while, was returned by a fort on our quarter. He invited us all to dine; but Lady Seaward intimated she could not accept the invitation, without previously receiving a visit from the Comtesse d'Anvere, the Commandant's lady. It was therefore arranged that we should go on shore to the hotel to dress, and that the Comtesse would make the visit before the dinner hour, and then send her carriage for the ladies.

This visit of ceremony was made. But there is not much ceremony with a Frenchwoman even of quality. The Comtesse talked of every thing, and to every body; was charmed with Rosalie; desired she might be allowed to attend her mistress; chatted to the girl as if she were her equal, joked with her, and said things that none but a Frenchwoman would say, and none but a Frenchwoman could like to hear.

However, we had a most kind and unrestrained reception at Government-house, and sat down to dinner with a numerous and elegant company. The removes were rapid, the conversation more so. I looked round me with astonishment: the Frenchmen contrived to eat and talk incessantly, without losing a word or a mouthful. There was a bottle of wine, and a decanter of water, placed between every two persons, with tumblers to each, but no wine glasses, of which they all drank freely. Those near me frequently saying, "Sir Edward!—Un coup du vin! il faut boire!" then putting a dash of wine into their own tumblers—" A votre santé!" and in this way I was compelled to empty nearly the bottle that was placed at my right hand, in drinking with my challengers. I trembled for the consequence, although the wine was weak; looking forward to a hard set-to after the departure of the ladies. The whole party, however, sat nearly three hours, with the cloth on the table; and to my surprise, when the bottles, and tumblers, and other things were removed, a cup of coffee, without cream, was handed round to each person; after which, small glasses with liqueurs were presented; and with this conclusion, ladies and gentlemen rose together, retiring into a large saloon, where cards and music were provided for the entertainment of the evening.

It gratified me exceedingly to witness the attention my dear wife received from every one. The politeness of the Frenchmen in their behaviour to her, carried with it a respect such as I had never seen before. But the ladies exhibited a different sort of manner; they examined every article of her dress, and descanted on it freely. She bore this rudeness with great good nature; and it was pleasing to me to hear her converse with them in French, without difficulty or embarrassment. La Comtesse admired "mi-lady's" diamond necklace; to which, on this occasion, she had suspended the royal cross. "C'est superb ce collier-ci!" exclaimed the Comtesse.—"Vous êtes une bonne Catholique, miladi; n'est-ce pas?" continued she, smiling; the next moment pushing her face into my wife's bosom, to kiss the diamond crucifix. My dear Eliza made her no reply. The appeal involved two subjects of deep interest, to that bosom on which the bauble rested:—her much-loved lord,—her dear departed Queen : subjects not to be named before the gay and thoughtless. If she had made any reply, it would have been a sigh or a tear.

I met Commodore De Roquefeuille at the Commandant's dinner; from whom I afterwards received a visit at the hotel, when he invited the whole party to visit his ship L'Achille. On our going on board, I was received with a guard and a salute of thirteen guns. My Eliza took great delight in witnessing these honours paid to her husband; not having yet forgot the mortifying scorn with which he had been treated by the Spaniard at Porto Bello. I must confess, however, that I was not favourably impressed either with the discipline, or the cleanliness, observed on board the French ship. The men were standing or lying about, hail fellow well met, among the officers; and the decks neither clean nor clear.

After having made these our visits of ceremony, we remained a few days longer at Cape François; living agreeably at the hotel, where we had the comfort to find good baths, and were rather surprised to learn that they were in general use throughout the island of St. Domingo: a luxury not known at Jamaica, unless at the Decoy, and perhaps a few other places belonging to persons of delicacy and taste. Cape François, like Kingston, is built regularly; the streets being in straight lines, intersecting each other at right angles. But the superiority of the French shops, induced us to visit them frequently, and purchase some trifles, such as hair-powder, scented soaps, and other perfumery, a few fans, and a variety of the like toys and nick-nacks. There we should have shut up our purses, had not Rosalie found out some elegant point and blonde lace, on which the ladies expended 100 dollars.

When on the eve of departure, Monsieur le Comte sent me six cases of superb Bourdeaux wine; and, in return, I begged his acceptance of as many hams, and two double Gloucester cheeses, for which he thanked me by note, saying they were highly acceptable.

On Wednesday, the 5th of July, we put again to sea, beating to the eastward along the northern shore of St. Domingo. In four days we doubled Point Caronge, and in a week more got fairly into the Mona Passage, the same strait by which my dear wife and myself had entered the Caribbean Sea, when on our first voyage from England. As we here passed Cape del Engans, a Spanish man-of-war brig was seen in shore of us. He hoisted his colours, and made sail towards us; but as we had no inclination to hold any intercourse with him, the yacht stood on her course; and having the wind a-beam, and a fine breeze, the Spaniard dropped astern quickly, and gave up the chase. We steered hence direct for Curagoa, distant about five hundred miles nearly south of us, and without accident or interruption made that island on the 19th of the month. As our vessel rounded Fort Amsterdam, to pass into the harbour, we could almost shake hands with the muzzles of the guns; while, on the other hand, I observed a chain lying on a rock opposite, ready to stretch across, for the purpose of securing the entrance against any hostile attempt to enter the port: although so narrow is the passage, yet the harbour is fine and capacious within.

Poor Van Kempen jumped as high as a Dutchman could jump, for joy, as we passed the Fort. The instant the anchor was dropped, a boat went on shore, to say who we were. Salutes were then fired, and arrangements made for my visit to the Governor. This piece of ceremony was also soon performed. His Excellency Mynheer Van Spengler, not having quite recovered from a fit of the gout, received me in his big chair. I made my visit short: and he sent an officer of rank to return it; who brought a message, inviting us all to dine at Government-house the next day.

On the morning of that day, taking Van Kempen with me, I waited on his Excellency, by his own request. I then told him as much of the Porto Bello story, as a conservator of English honour might be supposed to do; to which part Van Kempen bore ample testimony. Mynheer Van Spengler listened with sparkling eyes to the account of the rescue of the prisoners; getting fairly up upon his legs; then turning to Van Kempen, struck him on the shoulder with a familiarity that rather surprised me, at the same time saying something to him in Dutch: on which Van Kempen fell on his knees, kissing both hands of the Governor, "I have got 4000 dollars for this fellow," said his Excellency to me, "from the Spaniards, on account of his vessel they captured. When we heard of this capture," continued he, "and also of two others, our frigate went out, and, by way of reprisal brought in a Spanish vessel, with the Governor of Santa Martha on board, returning to Europe. They remonstrated, and desired to be released; but I told his Excellency Paternos, that when they released our vessels, or paid for them, they should also be released; but not till then. And as I chose to make a sure bargain, and get something, if I did not get the whole value of our captured vessels, I ordered the amount of manifest to be furnished by the Custom-house, and the probable value of the hulls estimated: for which amount his Excellency Don Gonsalvo de Moncada Paternos paid down the money, and he was then allowed to depart. This is our way; and the attack you ordered on the tower near Porto Bello is your way," continued the Governor of Curaçoa, laughing; "and such is the only way to bring those saucy dogs to their senses."

Before I took my leave this morning of Mynheer Van Spengler, he told me he had no wife, but that the Commandant's lady would be here to receive Lady Seaward and her sister at dinner; and that some of the ladies of the place were invited to meet them. Van Kempen soon left us, after having received the happy and unexpected tidings of his good fortune. He went to regale himself with a pipe, and to ruminate on his future plans of turning the dollar.

At two o'clock, Drake and his wife, with Lady Seaward and myself, went to Government-house. I was received by an officer's guard: and there was besides a considerable display of ceremonious pomp. The Commandant's lady, attended by several others, greeted my wife on the steps, and we all walked into the first saloon together; where, to my surprise, I saw several servants richly dressed, some of whom were negroes, with pipes and cigars in their hands, and each with a lighted cigar or pipe in his mouth. As the guests passed, they were offered these odoriferous tubes by the servants: we, of course, declined accepting any; but the Commandant's lady, and another, and several officers, who came in shortly afterwards, each took either a pipe or a cigar; not appearing very nice whether it had come from the servant's mouth, or not: and when we arrived in the second saloon, the greater part of the company collected there were also smoking. However, these favourite fumes became suspended for a few minutes, immediately on our arrival, to give time for introducing the company to us; after which they recommenced with fresh vigour. In about half an hour, servants came round with silver ewers and basins; the smoking then ended, and water was poured over the hands of every one that chose, and a clean napkin presented to dry with. Old Van Spengler hobbled off with Lady Seaward, as well as he could; I took the Commandant's lady; he gave his arm to Mrs. Drake; and my worthy captain escorted a noble looking vrouw, fat as a duchess, the wife of Mynheer Henkledorft, the fiscal of Amsterdam.

The dinner was more in the English, than the French style: yet some of the dishes were French, and the cooking excellent. We did not rise after dinner, as at Cape François, but drank in the English fashion. There was an abundance of Hockenstein at dinner; also Spanish and French wines, both then and afterwards. The ladies soon left us, when I began to fear that both Drake and myself would succumb under the rude pressure of Dutch hospitality; the health of the King of England, their High Mightinesses the States General, and all the great men of both nations, being toasted in bumpers. There was great festivity, but little ceremony observed at this part of the entertainment; so I was right glad when we were allowed to leave the table, and join the ladies. We found with them some additional company, and an execrable band of music in full clangour. The contre-danse, too, was in full operation. Most of our dinner party fell in; but some fell out, and more than one fell down. Drake and myself sat very quietly looking on, endeavouring to sober ourselves by silence, quietness, and coffee.

On the following day, we made a boat-excursion to the further end of the inner harbour, to the country-house of the Fiscal, where we dined; and had an opportunity of seeing a little of their rural economy. Indeed, there was no lack of hospitality; for during all the remainder of our stay at Curaçoa we were the guests of some one or other among the principal officers of the place, having only to complain of too much of it.

At the great dinner given by the Governor, and at every other place we dined, it was regretted that they could not treat us with London porter after cheese; which circumstance I did not forget on my departure, taking occasion at that time to distribute six hampers, I had brought with me, among our friends.

Van Kempen told me, the day after our visit to the Governor, that he had made up his mind to purchase a galliot, which was for sale, and carry on a trade from Seaward Islands, if I would promise him my protection, so as to compete fairly with my brother, and any other merchant of the place that might come there. I gave him that promise, and he in consequence bought the galliot, and laid in a cargo; when, at my request, he purchased for me a few cases of old hock, a quantity of fine tea, some spices, and other things, which were sold here at a much lower price than at Jamaica or in England. I was obliged to wait nearly a fortnight for Van Kempen's vessel; in the course of which time the yacht made an excursion with the Commandant's family, to the little island of Amba; where I obtained a fine Cape of Good Hope ram, with a tail like a Cheshire cheese, and two ewes of the same breed. Van Kempen took with him two families; one of which were Spaniards, cigar-makers; the other Dutch boors of Curaçoa, from the country, skilled in preparing cassava bread from the root of the manioc; and also that valuable article, flour from the Indian arrowroot.

On Tuesday, the 1st of August, we loosed from Curaçoa with the galliot in company. And as that vessel sailed well before the wind, the passage was made in seven days; a voyage little short of one thousand miles. On Wednesday, the 9th, we descried Drake's Head, the promontory of George's Island; and at the same instant broken water showed itself at no great distance from us: a sufficient demonstration of the danger of approach to these islands. In a couple of hours we saw the colours go up on the height; and at three o'clock in the afternoon, came to an anchor off the Fort, after an absence of seven weeks.

All our friends were in readiness on the beach, to receive us when we landed: foremost of the first was our dear little dog, who sprang from the side of Mrs. Rowley, and lying down amongst our feet, alternately licked the one and the other, actually uttering cries of an inexpressible ecstasy. Diego and his wife Rota followed with their welcome, and all their heart was in it. I could not but feel, that the tie which bound them so closely to us, should also bind us to them. "Kind Mistress Rota," said my Eliza, as the old negress embraced her knees, "rise, and kiss my cheek, for I love you as a child would love its nurse." The good woman rose, but kissed the hand of her mistress, saying, "the blessing of our God upon my lady!" My dear wife now took my arm; and although the people were crowding round us, she whispered to me—"Dear Edward, did you hear what Rota said? All I have seen, and all I have heard, since we have been away, has not afforded me such heart-felt pleasure, as the kind and pious greeting of that good old creature."

My brother could not conceal his chagrin, when he was informed that the galliot belonged to Van Kempen; nor could anything I said to him on the subject put him in good humour. I was sorry to observe this, but having no sinister object in view, I resolved to act with kindness to my brother, yet with strict justice to every settler in the colony. After a while, however, he seemed to take some interest in the detail of our voyage, on which I had entered with our good friend the Parson; the ladies, the while, having congregated in the piazza, where my sister Drake was holding forth on all the extraordinary things she had seen at St. Domingo, and Curaçoa.

In the morning, I visited the rising village, where I found Van Kempen's wife in all the transports a Dutch woman may be capable of exhibiting, at the good fortune of her husband, yet busy in making preparations for the people he had brought home to her. There were only two rooms, and a small central hall in her house, so that it would be impossible, with any kind of comfort, to lodge these two families. But, perhaps, Van Kempen's wife did not care about comfort, if she could but manage the thing in any way. However, I saw the difficulty, and told her the new comers should have the adjoining house, if her husband chose to take it; with which information the lady was much pleased, and expressed her thanks in the best English she could muster, on the occasion.

On my return to breakfast, Diego requested to know what he was to do with the broad-tailed sheep, which, for the present, he had turned into the woodland region with the deer. I told him, I thought he could not dispose of them better; therefore to allow them to remain.

After breakfast, I went into consultation with my dear wife, on the state of the colony. I saw, with deep regret, the elements of strife introduced; and I stated to her my misgivings on the subject. After some conversation, she said,—“Straight forward, dear Edward; follow the dictates of your own mind, which are just and upright. Call the gentlemen together to-morrow; explain your views, and avow your sentiments; and make your pleasure known to them: you are not bound to consider the humour, nor the particular interest of any one, not even your own brother, in opposition to your public duty.—Take the King's motto, 'Dieu et mon droit,' and you cannot do wrong." Thus spake my Minerva; and I resolved to follow her advice.

On the following day, I summoned my brother James, Mr. Van Kempen, the Parson, the Doctor, and Captain Drake. I said all that I thought was requisite to convince my brother, as well as every other person present, that justice and impartiality, and the good of the whole population of the colony, and the duty I owed to the King, and to myself, were the principles on which I desired to found all my proceedings. I then stated, that the time was now come to make some arrangements and regulations, which hitherto had not been necessary. I signified, in consequence, my intention of putting a duty of one per cent. ad valorem on all goods sold, bartered, or landed in the islands: out of which a colonial fund should be made, for the purpose of paying the clergyman, the doctor, the soldiers, and the artillery-men shortly expected, and other public expenses. But on exports, there would be no duty. I then informed my brother James, he must build a storehouse for himself; and I gave permission to Van Kempen to do the same; adding that, until they should complete their buildings, I would allow both of them to warehouse their goods in the government storehouse.

Before we separated, I was glad to see my brother take Van Kempen aside; soon after which they asked me if I would permit them each to build storehouses within the palisadoes of the avenue to the Cave storehouse. I did not hesitate in acquiescing with the request; but with this reserve—"I must have a ground-rent from each of you, of fifteen dollars a year." To this proposal they agreed.

I now requested Drake to send us some men, to assist in clearing one end of the great store-room, for Van Kempen's cargo. And thus ended our meeting; during which my brother and Van Kempen had become friends, because the measures I had taken seemed to bear hard on each of them, and on them only. In consequence of which, I suppose, my brother intuitively directed his attention to Van Kempen, as the only person present likely to sympathise with him, in being made to contribute so largely and unexpectedly to the expenses of the island establishment.

On muster-day, the Saturday following, after a grand display of firing and field exercise, I held a general meeting of the people, to whom I repeated some of the fundamental laws of the settlement. And I then expressed my wish, that all tradesmen should live in the village; and purchase provisions with their earnings, from those who have no trade beyond the produce of the earth. In conclusion, I said, that it gave me great pleasure to observe the progress many of the children and others had made in the manufactory of plait and hats; and I ventured to hope, that in a short time we should have abundance of money circulating among us, and every comfort we could desire.

On Sunday, the 13th, there was a full meeting of the colony at prayers, under the spacious canopy erected beneath the towering shade of the venerable and gigantic silk-cotton tree. It was highly satisfactory to witness the devotion of all present, and the great good order and cleanliness of old and young, Protestants and Catholics, Spaniards, Germans, Dutch, English, whites, blacks, and mulattoes—a motley group; soldiers and sailors, artificers and husbandmen; yet one flock, under one shepherd; brought, and kept together, by the unity of that spirit in which alone we may hope to find a bond of peace.

Early in the ensuing week I sent for Doctor Gordon, who had long established his character in my mind for scrupulous integrity. I told him it was my wish he should take upon himself the office of fiscal to the colony, the duties of which I explained to him in a few words. After the consideration of a day or two on his part, and some more explanation on mine, he agreed to accept the commission, with a salary of 200 dollars a year; which, added to his medical stipend, made up a comfortable income.

Towards the end of the month, the fruits of the earth were got in; Drake sailed for Jamaica; my brother's schooner returned from Virginia, with lumber, and flour, and some other merchandise; Captain Taylor arrived in the Mary, from Bristol; two Spanish schooners, from the main; and Van Kempen's galliot sailed, in company with the Mary, to the Bay of Honduras. The carpenters, and sawyers, and masons, were kept constantly at work; the storehouses were in progress; and something was continually doing to the houses of the village. Good Mr. Rowley gave strict attendance at the school; and the business of making plait and hats went on industriously. The German women were not idle; they produced a good deal of yarn, and no inconsiderable number of stockings; and the weaver's loom was kept going.

In September, Van Kempen's boors turned out some excellent Indian arrowroot flour; and they made cakes, twice a week, from the manioc, which were sold at the village. Van Kempen bought plait, hats, stockings, or anything else that was offered for sale; and he sold whatever could be wanted, from a needle to an anchor, from a skein of thread to a bale of cloth, and groceries of all kinds. There was abundance of small money in circulation; and thus the commercial wheel had been set going, and it promised speedily to bring grist to the mill.

On Drake's return from Jamaica, he brought with him two bags of cotton seeds, by Van Kempen's suggestion; which, subsequently, were planted throughout the sheep-walk on Edward's Island; the soil and situation being well adapted to the growth of cotton; and, in consequence, the sheep were removed to East Field, a fine pasturage opposite the Turtle Islands. The Governor sent me, by this opportunity, three artillery-men, all married men, two of whom had families, the other none; also two mulattoes, young free men, tolerably well trained to the fife and drum. I was glad of this accession to our military corps; for by his letters, as well as others I now received from England, I saw many reasons to expect that we must soon come to blows with the Spaniards.

The artillery-men were located in the village; but the two mulatto young men were lodged with Diego, and appointed to attend on me at the mansion as servants, when not called out on military duty.

Towards the end of the year, Allwood the younger, Hart the mason, Herbert the tailor, Gerard Onder the weaver, William Gortz the pork-butcher, Pablo Ximenes the straw man, Piedro Nomez the cigar maker, occupied houses respectively in the village, and my two sawyers, with their wives, occupied another. Van Kempen possessed two, and one had been allotted to the artillery-men. The elder Allwood retained his lot and house at Edward's Island; and as he seemed to have set his heart on it, I would not insist on his removing to the village, nor adopt any measures of rack-rent to force him to quit his original dwelling. The two New Englanders had left my brother's schooner, and now took up their permanent residence at Allwood Bay, where Purdy, also, was located; and Jack Martin, with his family, had been added to the number. So that Drake had for his neighbours, his old companions, the original crew of the Porghee. Their old captain supplied these men with a boat; and at his request I rented to them the turtle fishery of the islands, on condition that none were to be exported without license; and for every one brought in, they were to pay one dollar to the fiscal, and supply Gortz the butcher at one penny per pound live weight; whose price to the settlers was fixed at half a rial; thirty-two of which pieces amount to one dollar. Gortz proved a very useful member of society, although I remember when I thought his trade could not be made practicable in the island. He bought live pigs, killed and sold the meat; goats also; and now and then I ordered Diego to sell a sheep to him. I bought all my meat from him, which was a great accommodation, as no sort of animal substance could be kept well in this climate, beyond one day after being killed. Gortz was a capital fellow at making sausages, not only of pork, but turtle, and being well seasoned, they were much esteemed; but Van Kempen was out of his reckoning in expecting to make them an article of export; for with all the spices that could be given to them, they uniformly spoiled in a tropical climate within a fortnight after being made.

From the great quantity of work that had been done, the carpenters had received large sums of money. Old Allwood bought two young negro men at Kingston; and the younger Allwood bought a woman; and Xavier bought a young negro man. But these purchases were made under the recognised law of the colony, that after seven years' servitude, they were to have their freedom:

and all children born in bondage, to be made free, on attaining their one and twentieth year. My brother, also, had purchased six negro men, and four girls; and these new servants were brought from Jamaica, in the Tom Cod, early in December.

In consequence of these accessions, I removed Xavier, with Hachinta his wife, and master George, the first-born of our islands, together with the apprentice Matthew, whom I had placed with Xavier, to the lot at Edward's Island, vacated by Hart the mason, now removed to the village. Xavier was my old friend, and I was happy in an opportunity of conferring on him a kindness: I gave him the house, and allotment of land, in perpetuity, for the consideration of one head of Indian corn yearly. My dear wife participated in the pleasure of settling our old friends so comfortably; and seized on the occasion, to express her wish that something might be done for our most faithful servants and friends, Diego and Rota. But these excellent people were too useful, and even necessary to me, to be alienated from us; we therefore agreed to give them a salary of one hundred dollars a year, and a handsome suit of clothes annually.

When these intentions were made known, Master Diego and his Donna were much gratified: perhaps more by the mark of our regard, than by the reward that accompanied it. Yet nothing less than my old blue and gold uniform coat, remade into something of another form, would satisfy Master Diego; to which the old cocked hat, with a cockade, must be added. These were for days of state, and I rather expected he would desire a peruke also. My dear wife gave one of the negro girls to Mistress Rota, to keep her house in order; and it was now thought right to disencumber them of the two mulatto lads; who were, therefore, turned over to lodge with Derrick and his wife, then occupants of the house at the other corner of the poultry-yard.

The fiscal's receipts had been considerable, especially from the one per cent. duty ad valorem; and the impost on turtle, also, had contributed some hundred dollars. Seeing this, I determined to advance the pay of the soldiers: and accordingly I gave Craig, a halbert, with sergeant's pay; and made Andrews and M'Nabb corporals; the other, Finlayson, remained a private, and assistant drillman to the train-band, with an extra sixpence per diem. I found it necessary, also, to give each of the artillery-men sixpence a day besides the King's pay, to enable them to live; as their wives and children had not as yet been able to learn the plait and hat work sufficiently well to add anything considerable to their support.

Thus, something like a system was established; and that solitude which my dear wife and myself trod alone five years ago, had become the busy haunt of men, producing all the necessaries of life abundantly. All living creatures had increased amazingly; and the products of the earth were more than the colony could consume. The fruit trees, which our own hands had planted, bore fruit in many places. Plantains and bananas had become plentiful; pine-apples were no longer a rarity; melons were thrown, from their superfluity, to the pigs; and Indian corn was little used, except in feeding the poultry. Manufactures, on a small scale, had been commenced; and a lucrative commerce had found its way into our harbour. All the people were getting money, which no longer was drawn from my private resources only. Our laws were few, but wholesome; and we desired to make our holy religion the rule of our conduct. In consequence, the population was healthy, orderly, industrious, and contented.

On Monday, the 25th of December, all the people of the islands assembled by previous summons, to attend divine service under the sacred canopy of the great tree. After which they betook themselves to the isthmus; nearly half a mile of which, at this season of the year, is thrown into shade soon after mid-day by the promontory; where a variety of amusements were set on foot—our isthmean games! Asses were made to run races, and Drake's sailors were the jockeys. Some planks had been pierced in their centre, and placed on a pivot, with their ends connected by pieces of board at equal distances, so as to form a large horizontal wheel: the boys and girls, and some of the younger negroes, got on them, and were whirled round with more or less velocity, to their great delight. The drum and fife kept the dancers going; and to regale the whole party, my dear wife had taken care to provide tea and coffee, and lemonade and cigars in abundance. We gave a grand dinner at the mansion, and a royal salute was fired from the Fort, in commemoration of the Nativity. The day was made a day of joy to ourselves, and to the people.

The following Sabbath brought the year to a close, when we returned thanks to Almighty God for all the blessings he had given us to enjoy.

CHAPTER VIII.

IN January the rains were heavy, but unattended by those horrible storms to which we had been accustomed; yet every precaution had been prepared to secure the vessels, and the buildings, against their expected violence. Advantage was taken of the season, to put in the roots and seeds, and other articles of husbandry growth. I myself undertook to graft and inoculate several of the fruit trees, with cuttings or buds from those approved plants I had received two or three years ago from Jamaica, in tubs. February saw us rest from our agricultural labours throughout the island; but in the course of them, I had assisted Van Kempen with Diego's men, to plant the Indian arrowroot and cassava: and I directed Nomez, on the present occasion, to make a large sowing of the sweet-scented Vanilla peas, round any tree excepting the fruit trees, so that the vines might run up. He having obtained a bag of them from one of the Spanish traders, for the purpose of mixing them with tobacco when put together for mellowing. With this improvement to our unrivalled tobacco, he bid fair to turn out the best cigars in the world. The other settlers were able to manage their own business.

On the 14th of February, Drake sailed for Jamaica. And during this month, four Spaniards, one French, one Dutch, and two English vessels arrived in St. George's Harbour; for so I now denominated it. Sale or barter was the object of these vessels, and both they and our merchants found the trade to their liking. But I was most gratified in seeing the ready vend Van Kempen had made for the straw hats and yarn stockings, and the other little manufactured things, products of our island industry. My care was to preserve peace and order, and prevent the landing of spirits. Doctor Gordon, as fiscal, was faithful to his trust; and took special caution to collect his duties without vexation or embarrassment to the traders; the amount of which soon exceeded all expectations.

In this month, we had an accession of four families from Charles Town, Carolina. They were English emigrants, who had sailed from Hull, with an intention of going to Georgia, but did not reach it; for having met the captain of my brother's vessel at Charles Town, where they had been obliged to put in, he persuaded them to accompany him to Seaward Islands, instead of persevering to go forward. I settled these people at Soldiers' Town, excepting one family, sent to occupy a vacant house at Allwood's Bay.

Early in March, Drake returned from Jamaica, bringing letters with him, that had arrived there from England. The accounts we had received from Awbury and Hartland, were of the most comfortable nature; and not less so a letter from Perry and Co., enclosing a statement of my accounts. It appeared that I had now a balance in their books of 5476*l*. On quitting England two years ago, I had left in their hands 4503*l*.; since that period, they had received for interest on my stock, 3708*l*. Mr. Goldsmith had remitted to them, in the two years 800*l*., being half the rents of Hartland; less, 50*l*. Besides, I had credit for 160*l*., being interest of the money left floating in their hands. I had drawn since I quitted England, 3695*l*., including the amount of the settlement made on Mrs. Drake. Such was the state of my account: yet, I thank God, it has neither been by meannesses, nor by exactions, that my circumstances were brought into so flourishing a condition.

In April, a Spanish guarda costa chased a small French schooner upon our coasts, that had been carrying on a smuggling traffic in the Gulf of Darien, and drove her among the rocks of our outer reefs, to the southward. On its being discovered by Craig at the flag-staff, he fired a gun, and hoisted the colours, supposing that the schooner was English. The Porghee got instantly under weigh, accompanied by the Avon. It, however, happened not to render assistance to the schooner, but to the Spaniard, for he, being the larger vessel, struck upon a shoal, over which the other had passed; and by the time the Avon got alongside of him, he was throwing his guns overboard, and preparing to cut away his masts: but the Avon took out one of his Anchors, and they hove him off.

The Frenchman, the while, ran up close to the Porghee, and requested a pilot to take him into the harbour; but Drake very wisely advised him to stand out again to sea, and pursue his voyage, his enemy being no longer in a condition to follow him; and as most likely it would be necessary to bring in the Spaniard to refit, their meeting in the port might be attended with some unpleasant consequences. The Frenchman profited by the advice, and made the best of his way, having told what he was, and where he had been, not concealing that he now had twelve thousand dollars on board. But the prize escaped; and the guarda costa, leaking apace, was glad to come into our harbour to be repaired.

When it was reported to me that the Spanish vessel was approaching, I ordered the bugle to be sounded, and the train-band to be put under arms. I did this merely for the sake of appearance, wishing to impress the stranger with a respectful idea of our situation, though perhaps our wall of rocks and reefs was our best defence. On the vessel's coming to an anchor off the Fort, I perceived she was a vessel of a large class, being pierced for twenty guns; I therefore ordered the captain to be received with a guard; and I then thought it proper to dress myself, and those about me, in a manner suitable to the occasion. In a short time, he was introduced by Drake. Master Diego being attired in the old suit of blue and gold, stood behind my chair in waiting, ready to officiate as interpreter. After many compliments from the Spanish captain, and an assurance on my part that his ship should be speedily repaired, I desired him to be seated; and finding he spoke French, I dispensed with Diego; then, after some general conversation, and a further assurance of rendering him efficient service, I requested his company at dinner.

Diego, who was always at hand on these occasions, came in on being called. Before I had time to speak to him, the Spanish captain, who now was on his legs, addressed him thus:—"Senhor Diego! I have the happiness of being your namesake."—"Don Diego!!" replied my sable friend, bowing low and courteously before he answered. "I am much honoured; but your Excellency has many other names, no doubt, besides Diego."—"No, indeed," answered the caballero, "only Freza."—"I like you for that, good master," replied old Diego; "I never knew very good people have very many names." I now ordered Senhor Diego to attend on Don Diego, and to inform me as to anything he might wish to be done. Drake and the Spaniard, with the Spaniard's namesake, now took their leave, and set immediately to work to arrange matters for repairing the bottom of the damaged ship.

When they were gone, I desired Sergeant Craig to signify to the people, that they must all do military duty so long as the Spanish vessel remained: I told him, also, to keep a full sergeant's guard constantly at the Plank-house: from whence a relief of sentinels, at the landing-place, at the Fort, and before the mansion, were to be supplied night and day; and to plant the two field-pieces before the palisadoes, with an artillery sentinel; and to fire the gun at the flag-staff, every evening at sunset; and to beat off with drum and fife, night and morning, at the Fort. Such was our display of military matters, and they were punctually attended to.

Two large tents or booths were erected on the isthmus, for the men belonging to the guarda costa; and he was requested to plant his own sentinels in charge of them. A newly-finished house in the village, was appropriated to the captain and officers for their accommodation; and not only these gentlemen, but the crew, were supplied daily with fresh provisions, and vegetables in abundance. In a few days the ship was hove down at the black rock; and putting on Derrick, and the carpenter of the Porghee, in addition to the Spanish carpenter belonging to the guarda costa, a new plank was soon put in and calked; and the ship again fitted, by the help of Drake's crew, within ten days, and made ready for sea, to the no small surprise of the Spaniard at such despatch of business.

Before his departure, he offered to pay for what had been done, and for the supplies he had received; but I declined allowing him to do so for either. On going away, however, he made Drake a magnificent present,—no less than a box of cigars, worth about five dollars! which my noble-minded friend very properly turned over to his carpenter. On the 23d, the Spaniard was escorted out to sea, clear of the reefs, by our boats; of which I was heartily glad, having been subjected to great inconvenience by his visit. But on the departure of this Don, we resumed our usual peaceful and industrious occupations.

Early in May, my dear wife and myself proposed making a regular visit to every place in the islands. On Monday, the 7th, we commenced our "Progress," as it was called in the days of good Queen Bess. But instead of travelling with a large retinue of courtiers and retainers, my sweet vice-queen, and her maid of honour Rosalie; myself, and master Diego, with our faithful little dog, were intended to constitute the whole cortège. Early in the morning, just as the day had dawned, our two mules were brought to the door; and the two asses also, which had been trained to carry Mr. Rowley's children. They were gorgeously caparisoned with a velvet back cushion, and a richly fringed bridle for the occasion. The lady and Rosalie were soon seated. I then mounted my mule, and Master Diego, in his best attire, bestrode the other; and thus in cavalcade, with Fidele running in advance, we set forth for the foot of the steep path that leads to the flag-staff on the promontory. We did not proceed direct for our destination, but turned off in the contrary direction, making a detour of the silk-cotton tree. If this were to be a journey devoted solely to feeling, we might have stopped here; there being food enough, without going further, to dilate the heart, and give birth to reflections at once the most delightful and absorbing; but we proceeded. On approaching the little spring where once Fidele and his mistress killed an iguana, he instinctively ran up to it. "It is there," said Diego, "where I first drank water here! and it was under that tree I took my first sleep! and they are as holy places to me, good master, Sir Edward."—"And it was under that tree, Diego," rejoined my dear wife, "that your kind master, and myself, were sitting, when we first discovered you in the canoe; and it is an event I look back upon with a grateful pleasure."

We had now come to the north-east corner of the open ground, finding ourselves among the orange trees bearing fruit; and immediately after, among the shaddock trees in full blossom. "These are the groves, my dear Eliza," observed I, "which our own hands planted, when this was our paradise."—"And it is so yet," she replied; "are we not both still here?"—I well understood her allusion; and stooping from the back of the gigantic mule on which I rode, stretched forth my hand, which she caught, and pressed affectionately. Then pushing forward, we trotted along the margin of the slope; having the high craigs above us on our left, thickly wooded with palm-trees, but skirted below by the native Indian fig, and here and there a few orange and lime trees, we had planted some years ago. We rode in this direction for a quarter of a mile; the mansion, with its outhouses and fort, being upon our right. This brought us to the southern extremity of the open ground; whence we proceeded along a fine beach, for another quarter of a mile, with a thick skirting of wood on our left; having a bold but barren hill, shaped like the head of a bald-pated man, nearly three hundred feet in height, rising abruptly over it. This brought us to the spot where the winding path, leading to the summit of the promontory, commences; that path which my dear wife, and myself, and Fidele had discovered, and indeed had partly formed, five years ago, when in search of our shipwrecked companions. Here we dismounted, to give Diego an opportunity of tightening the saddle-girths, to fit them for the ascent. And while he was so occupied, my dear Eliza and myself visited the little bay beneath us; where we had landed in the punt on that occasion. Here we now sat down under the same tree, beneath which we then had placed our basket. The recollection of these events, ever dear to us, was now made doubly so, by being on the spot where they had taken place.

The girths being tightened, we all remounted our cavalry, if mules and asses may be so called; but they are the only sort of cattle that could achieve the rugged ascent. These sure-footed steeds never make a halt nor a stumble; the rider having no other care than to give the animal his head, and keep fast hold of the pommel of the saddle: and so we did; and thus we proceeded upwards at ease, and in safety. It was pleasing to see the fruit trees on each side of us, as we ascended; the work of a few minutes of recreation, when my Eliza with her husband and her dog made her first ascent. We also marked the spot in our way, where Fidele had surprised the armadillo, now lost, and almost forgotten. After a steady climb of half an hour, the party arrived at the flag-staff, where I found Sergeant Craig before us, on duty for the morning look-out.

At this commanding position we halted, and looked round in ecstasy, over land and sea, in silent admiration. But Rosalie could not long restrain her feelings on the occasion, whatever they might be. "Voilà !" dit-elle, "tout le monde au-dessous !" Her exclamation reminded me of one of our Germans, who cried out, "Gortz Ueberhalb !" when the pork-butcher climbed up the rock, after one of his pigs. It must be confessed, however, that the association did an injustice to the sentiment of Rosalie: she alluded only to the expanse of earth and water, but the German dealt out a sarcasm, by double entendre—Gortz above all the world.

Having rested our animals, and satisfied our wandering and admiring eyes, we proceeded along the crest of the promontory, towards the isthmus. Something less than a couple of miles brought us to the edge of the pre-cupitous face of the rock that overshadows the sandy position below, during the winter solstice; here we halted, looking with pleasure over the cocoa-nut grove, towards the cultivated grounds beyond the long extended neck of land, the fine grounds of Peccary Field, and those attached to the soldiers' habitations. The Doctor's house and grounds were concealed from our view by the high mass of rock that forms the eastern side of the Peccary Creek, and this gigantic object also prevented our seeing the school-room. We had a goodly prospect of German Town, from the flag-staff; but from this place, it also was screened from sight, by a finely-wooded hill that lies to the west of Peccary Field, forming one side of the pass thence to German Town. Before we quitted this position, my dear wife and myself stretched our eyes along the reef, to the spot where, by the mercy of God, we had been delivered from the perils of shipwreck; and then, with one spirit, we lifted up our hearts to Heaven, and blessed God audibly, saying at the same moment, "Thou art gracious, O Lord!"

On our return, the cavalcade surprised a large herd of wild goats, the product of some stragglers from the tame goats below; but these had breathed the mountain air long enough to own none but the genius of liberty for their master, and therefore scampered off to their craggy dwellings, on the instant they perceived us. We had now a grand view of Allwood's Bay opposite to us, and Rosalie thought she saw Captain Drake and his lady walking: it might be so, for I certainly soon after discerned something like a blue and a white pigeon perched on the rock below his house; but as I had only a bird's eye view of them, I would not call in question the accuracy of our young handmaid's piercing glance or quick conjecture; and it is well I did not, for it turned out that she had been correct,—it was even they watching our return.

The forenoon was far advanced when we made our appearance at the mansion. Dear Mistress Rota had laid out a nice breakfast of fruit, and wine, and tea, invitingly waiting for us; and with which we refreshed ourselves; but being tired, we then laid down for a few hours to rest. During our repose,—for we did not sleep,—our attention was awakened by hearing Rosalie talk to Mrs. Rowley's little girls, sometimes in French, in which she had well instructed them, sometimes in English, describing to them all the wonderful events of the morning. The pass was impassable, the mountain was stupendous, the rocks were terrific, the coup-d'œil was sublime. Unfortunately, there was neither giant nor castle to finish her romance. "Mais assurément," dite-lle, "la montagne chauve soit la tête d'un géant avant le Déluge." When I heard this, I could not help exclaiming, "Bravo, Rosalie!" on which she and the little girls set up a joyous laugh, and ran off from that part of the hall, which, for the credit of her story, was too contiguous to our door.

On the following day, the asinine cavalry were sent over early in the morning, in the Avon, to Allwood's Bay; and we soon followed in Master Diego's barge, having on this occasion a St. George's flag in the bow, presented to me by my friend Drake. My dear sister and her husband, attended by his old crew, and the other settlers there, received us with three cheers, which were as gallantly returned by Diego and his men, before we landed. The first object that arrested our attention, was the fine growth and far extended double lines of the Barbadoes palm, planted by Diego about three years ago. It is a beautiful tree, the queen of all the palm trees, and not unfrequently attaining the height of one hundred feet. It is that palm, with a swell in its trunk, which is to be seen introduced, on account of its beauty and magnificence, into most views of Indian landscape.

Our row across the harbour, had given us an appetite for breakfast ; we therefore proceeded at once on foot to Drake's château.

As soon as breakfast was over, the same party set forward, mounted as on the preceding morning, Fidele being his own horse. We first made a detour of the bay, and were much pleased with the neatness of the people's grounds, and habitations, the abundance of fruit trees, and live stock. On finishing the circuit of the bay, Mrs. Allwood presented us with a bowl of goat's milk ; and took that opportunity of telling us, that, in spite of all her care, she could not prevent the guinea fowl from running off in great numbers, and that, in consequence, she had no doubt we should see many of them in other parts of the island.

Having finished the circuit of the cultivated grounds, we directed our course to the northward ; passing out from this settlement, round the foot of the conical hill, at the point where the beautiful little fountain pours forth ; having on our right the black rock that projects here into the sea, forming, with the beach, a natural cove or snug boat harbour, directly under Spring Hill ; and this was the rock on which we saw the two turtle doves, from the promontory on the preceding morning.

After riding through this narrow but romantic pass, we came suddenly out upon Long Bay, where the sheep had been placed for three years. A multitude of young cocoa-nut trees, planted in groups, had now grown sufficiently high to give a pleasing appearance to a tract naturally dull in its aspect. As we rode along, Diego frequently stopped me, to observe the young cotton shrubs, some of which had attained a height of twelve to eighteen inches. "They grow fast now, rains soon come, sir," said he; "two year more, plenty cotton for all German women to make stockings." This remark of honest Diego, gave an additional interest to the objects that presented themselves. A couple of miles brought us to the northern extremity of the bay, which terminates by a rocky cul-de-sac, enclosing some acres of very good soil, in which acacias were growing luxuriantly. But I was still more pleased to see in this place the orange also, and the lime, planted no doubt by Diego's patriarchs, when they were sent round the island in a canoe, to put in the seeds of fruit trees, and peppers in every spot fit for their reception near the shores.

Hence we made our way between the southern point of the horse-shoe rock and a sand-hill; proceeding onward to the west side of the island, with the intention of riding southward as far as the high hills behind Drake's château. But we were soon stopped in our progress, by trees and underwood, extending from the lower hills to the water's edge. Paroquets were here in abundance, and some of Mrs. Allwood's gallenas, for anything I know to the contrary, making a hideous screaming; then to our terror, Diego thought he saw a herd of peccaries, on which he very sagaciously dismounted, and took up Fidele with him on the mule. We, in consequence of this obstacle, retraced our steps; and arrived at the château time enough to dress for dinner. Here we were met by our friends from Peccary Field, and our worthy guests from the mansion.

In the cool of the evening, the whole party visited the settlers, and did not lose the opportunity of making some little presents to the wives and children of the English emigrant family; to whom my dear wife also promised an addition to their live stock, and some other things necessary to their comfort. Before we returned, Drake took us to a natural grotto in the side of the conical hill. By accident, he had discovered it in his rambles; and thinking it a pleasant cool retreat, had made an agreeable walk through the trees to it, sloping gently upwards in a winding direction. It was indeed a delightful spot, with which we were all charmed; but my poor sister was rather too much fatigued to enjoy this enchanting termination of the walk, her situation being peculiar, and rather advanced.

When reseated over our coffee and a cigar, Drake explained to me a plan he had projected, of making a corkscrew walk up to the summit of the conical hill: he said it could be done by an ascent of one foot in twenty, extending the spiral line to the length of a mile, or thereabouts, from the base to the summit; which he truly imagined would educe a novel and beautiful effect from the surrounding scenery upon the eye, at every step of the ascent. We all returned by starlight to our respective homes; but the cavalry had preceeded us, at the going down of the sun.

The following day we rested at home, being somewhat fatigued by riding,—an exercise to which we were totally unaccustomed. Early this morning, after my dear wife, and Mrs. Rowley and her children, returned from the bath, I accompanied them to the pen, to inspect the goats and poultry. She here took occasion to desire Abel to send a supply, not only to the new comers at Allwood's Bay, but also to those located at Soldiers' Town; to which many other things were added, by the same kind command, when the stock was despatched. The women were milking the goats on our arrival at the pen, previous to their being led forth by Abel to browse. It was surprising to observe the quantity of fine milk that streamed from the udders of these little creatures; a large bottle-shaped calabash of which was despatched by a canoe every morning to the further end of the isthmus for the children, and one was now ready filled to send away.

On Thursday morning, arrangements having been made for a general examination at the school-room, we arrived there at ten o'clock. Nearly every individual of the colony was before us; and the number of children under tuition now exceeded fifty, besides some women. The heads of the classes read to us, and they all exhibited their writing, which did much credit to Mr. Rowley, and to themselves generally. After this, specimens of their work in plait and hats were shown; on which occasion Van Kempen said,—“The best proof that can be given of their success is, that they who some time ago could make a hat worth no more than one dollar, can now make a hat worth two dollars;” and to show his sincerity, he purchased some of their manufactures on the spot, at the high prices he named. The whole business was over by two o'clock; when the books and straw-work were removed, and the tables spread with plantain tarts, cocoa-nut cakes, pine-apples, melons, and oranges, for the refreshment and encouragement of our young scholars, and straw-workers. Pablo Ximenes and his wife, did not go without commendation; and, as a reward for their good conduct, they were now settled permanently in a house at no considerable distance from the school-room. My brother gave us a magnificent dinner at Peccary Field on the occasion, to which all the principal people in the island had been invited, not excepting Van Kempen and his wife, whom I was happy to see there, and apparently on very good terms with their host: the duty on imports, and some other arrangements, had united them. Their interest having been made the same, their feelings soon became the same also.

By the additional strength of six negro men and four girls, whom Mr. Seaward imported last October, he had now been able to cultivate a large field of tobacco, besides doing justice to all the other crops. Before this, when two of the women I gave him, married the two negro sawyers, my bondsmen, it diminished his servants two in number; but he now had nine men and seven women; and as I saw he was putting them all to field labour, while we had but three negro women servants, independent of Mistress Rota, and the girl my dear wife gave to her for an attendant, I gave my brother a hint, that he might return two out of the three remaining girls he had from us, which would make our numbers equal. Like a good and proper husband, he said in reply, that "he would consult Mrs. Seaward about it." In a few days after, she sent two of her new negro girls to the mansion, in lieu of the others, "whom," she said, "she really could not spare!" My dear Eliza only laughed at this manœuvre, saying, "Never mind; Rota will soon make them as useful as the others already are. But I am sure my sister forgets that the girls she has retained, will have their freedom three years sooner than those she has sent to us. I will remind her of it, if you please; and we shall then see how she will act." In the sequel, my dear wife did remind her of it; and it fell out as she had anticipated. Our former servants were returned to us; and, agreeable to request, the two new negro girls sent back to Peccary Field.

The night after the school-examination, was passed at my brother's; on the following morning, we set forward, mounted and escorted as before, to make a visit to German Town. After riding through the plantation, which at this season of the year was in great beauty, we soon entered the pass cut by Diego and his men between the hills. On emerging from the defile, we suddenly opened the fine district occupied by the Germans. They had profited by the goodness of the soil and the aspect: their crops were highly promising, and their grounds in the best possible order. Their houses, and every thing within them, appeared neat, and clean, and orderly: the women were all employed, either in knitting or spinning. The widow of Schneider lamented that she was entirely indebted to the goodness of her neighbours, for keeping her grounds in order; and gave me to understand that Herman Brandt, one of Van Kempen's sailors, would marry her, if he might leave the galliot, and live with her. I promised her my best services on the occasion; which, not many days after, I had an opportunity of rendering effectually; and Brandt took possession of Schneider's widow, and allotment. Gortz's house and grounds were vacant, the stoccade of which was converted into a sort of piggery, his house being filled with wood and old casks. I therefore resolved to offer it to one of the emigrant families now at Soldiers' Town, there being three families in two houses. In a few days after my return, this arrangement was carried into effect, by their drawing lots; and the prize fell to David Empson, a worthy man, with a wife and three children, one of whom, a boy of twelve years of age, promised fairly soon to become a good agriculturist.

Before I quitted the German settlement, we paid a visit to the tomb of the unfortunate man who had fallen a victim to intemperance; and contemplated his fate, I hope, with that compassion which is ever due from one frail mortal to another. From this spot we attempted the untried ascent to the flag-staff on the northern height of George's Island ; but were obliged to desist, for here to us the pass really was impassable : so that the fancy of Rosalie was left at full liberty to see "in its mind's eye" whatever it pleased, as to the wonders of the yet unexplored mountain. On our return, Matthew Hinklemann's wife, the Flemish woman, had prepared a welcome collation for us, of roasted plantains, an omelet, and coffee ; with which having refreshed ourselves, and made her a suitable compliment, we rode once more round the settlement, delighted to see the abundance of the goats and poultry, and the forward state of the fruit trees, besides a plantation of the cocoa or chocolate nut, that was expected to bear next year. By one o'clock we arrived at Peccary Field, and, being rather fatigued by our ride, reposed for an hour before dinner ; returning after it, in the barge with Diego, to our own home.

These excursions afforded my dear wife and myself much matter for reflection, and even more for discussion. But there was one reflection, and one sentiment, paramount to every other,—the pleasure we derived from seeing ourselves successful in making so many happy, and the desire of seizing every opportunity, which the late survey afforded us, of adding to the comfort of such as we perceived in any way requiring our assistance or good offices.

Saturday was a grand field-day at great guns as well as small arms. And on Sunday, after divine service, Brandt was married, as were also two couples of negroes ; and five children were then baptized.

Early in the ensuing week, my dear wife and myself visited the village, and were entertained by Van Kempen's vrow with great hospitality. She showed us the progress they were making in the manufacture of arrowroot : and accompanied us to the houses of Gerard Onder, the weaver, Pedro Nomez, the cigar-maker, and others, with whose success and industry I was much gratified. The carpenters had made great progress; there were fifteen houses finished, and some others begun. There was, notwithstanding, a regret mixed up with this display of colonial prosperity. The face of the place was changed. The beautiful stream of water, which we had discovered gushing freely from the rock, and where Fidele and our ducks used to drink, and bathe delighted in its clear rill, was now covered in, or directed to flow unseen; a vessel was unloading at the rock, which before had stood in such romantic solitude; boats and canoes were at the landing-place behind it; people were going to and fro to the storehouses: the thicket was no more; its place was occupied by storehouses, field-pieces, and a kennel for our watch-dog: the wooden palace, once our pride, and our happy and silent retreat from labour, was now converted into a guard-room, before which the sentinel stood with firelock and fixed bayonet. We turned our back upon this scene, with something like a feeling of self-condemnation at what we had done.

On entering the woodland region, the unchanged face of the hill, and ample shade of the surrounding trees, refreshed our spirits; and as we lingered on the way, our four beautiful deer, with three pretty fawns, approached closely to us. With these we held communion quite to our taste; and during the hour in which we stood gazing on them, it brought back our minds to that tone of delightful composure, which to us constituted the chief charm of life.

Before the middle of the month, all the harvest that this season of the year produced, was well got in; and soon after, the rains fell in torrents for nine days. On the cessation of which, the agriculturist again put in his roots and seeds; trusting them with a perfect faith to Him who gives the increase.

During the month of June, we frequently made excursions of a morning after the bath, taking Mr. Rowley's two dear little girls with us on the borricos, while my dear wife rode one of the mules, and myself the other. Our worthy parson, on those occasions, was content always to go in the canoe that took the milk to the school-house, and return to dinner by the same conveyance.

A great part of every day was necessarily dedicated to the business of the colony, both by my kind-hearted help-mate and myself, to watch over the tempers, morals, and wants of the people individually, which required unremitting attention.—Still we found time to read and write; and my Eliza sometimes amused herself with enlarging the sketches she had made at different times of the places and objects which, on our first coming, had excited in us the greatest interest. We kept as much aloof as we could from the bustle incident to the arrival of my brother, or Van Kempen's vessel; or that which was always greater, occasioned by the coming in of a foreigner. Retirement was our delight, and we courted it as much as lay in our power. Our home was a happy home; Mr. and Mrs. Rowley were good and sensible; Rosalie and the little girls were joyous and merry; Fidele also contributed not a little to our pleasure, by his attachment and attentions, and by associations, whenever he offered himself to our notice, that never failed to warm the heart with kind and otherwise delightful feelings. Thus our time passed agreeably, and I hope usefully, until an unexpected event called us forth to a very different scene.

CHAPTER IX.

A brig of war arrived in the last week of June, from England and Jamaica; which, by the way, was nearly wrecked in her approach to the islands. By this vessel I received orders to proceed to Porto Bello, and deliver letters to the Spanish Governor, from Sir Robert Walpole himself; and from the Spanish Ambassador at London; the tenor of which was—"That amicable arrangements having been made between the two Courts, in January last, and a convention having been signed to carry the same into effect, Sir Edward Seaward, Governor and Commander of Seaward Islands, is commanded to proceed to Porto Bello, and offer any apology and reparation required, for the attack that had been made on a certain tower or fort there, by two of his Britannic Majesty's vessels, in October, 1737, for the rescue of certain persons then in the custody of his Excellency the Governor of Porto Bello, which had in consequence been effected." My instructions, however (to which translated copies of the letters to Don Francisco Martinez de Retez, were annexed), went no farther than "offer a proper apology," and any reasonable reparation, for the alleged aggression.

On reading these despatches, every honest and manly feeling within me rose up in rebellion against this base and sneaking policy. I could not but suspect that Sir Robert Walpole had seized on this occasion to mortify, if not disgrace me. I knew he hated me, because the Queen had been my friend; and now the more so, because his Majesty had promised me his protection. After I had read these infamous papers, silently, in the presence of Captain Knight, I retired into my wife's room, much agitated. My dear Eliza was already there, having left the hall on the Captain's approach. I quickly communicated to her the business they commanded me to do. On hearing it, she was equally indignant with myself; saying,—“I am sure such proceedings are without the knowledge of the King: I would not insult him so much as to think otherwise. Observe,” continued she, “how this business is managed, to place you in the most unpleasant situation possible. The Spanish Governor is led to expect from you any apology and reparation he may desire: while you, by your instructions, are left to be the judge of how far you are to go. Sir Robert Walpole must know that the Spaniard will demand what you cannot, either in fairness or in honour, concede; and that therefore one of two things must happen to you; either that you will fail again in your mission to Porto Bello, or that you will compromise the interests of your country, and the honour of your King; so that disgrace is the only wages you can receive, for going on the service required at your hands. Let Captain Knight,” continued she, “do the business himself, if he please; but do not stain your name, my honoured husband, by such an embassy.”—“I feel precisely as you do, my own sweet angel!” I replied; “but I must not decide too hastily. The order is peremptory; and you may perceive it says—‘Proceed in your yacht to Porto Bello.’”—“That must never be done!” exclaimed my faithful and clear-sighted counsellor. “If the Spaniard's get Drake into their hands, who knows but they may imprison him, if not hang him?” I was deeply impressed with this awful suggestion, and could only reply, that it was an infamous business altogether.

On returning to the hall, I requested Captain Knight to dine with me; and desired Drake, who had accompanied him on shore, to be of the party; on which they took their leave, and left me to digest the bitter potion my friend Sir Robert Walpole had prescribed for me. After consulting with my dear wife for nearly two hours, turning the subject every way, and looking at it in all its bearings, at last we reluctantly concluded, that it was my duty to go to Porto Bello, and that therefore there was no alternative. But at the same time, I was so thoroughly satisfied of the truth of her suggestions respecting Drake, that I resolved to use a discretionary privilege in leaving the Porghee in the offing, and to proceed myself into the harbour with the sloop of war only, until I should be assured that no hostile intention existed in the mind of the Governor towards my friend and his crew.

Having made my mind up before the dinner hour arrived, as to the course to be taken, I was pretty well myself again; but my dear Eliza could not so readily subdue her feelings of indignation against the minister; so that when his name came on the tapis, she could not help breaking out with the following observation:—"If his Majesty has any fault, it is giving his confidence to a man who must be either a fool or a knave. But, indeed, all knaves are fools," continued she, "and such his whole conduct towards the Spaniards will prove him to be. The King, glad to get rid of him at any rate, will one day or other dismiss him, either with a fool's cap or a coronet." This explosion of feeling, at least the latter part of it, amused our guest a good deal; and being, perhaps, as little in the habit of disguising his sentiments as some other persons present, he laughed heartily. Mr. Rowley said, he could not condemn Sir Robert Walpole's policy, as it always had for its object the preservation of peace: and if the Spaniards were faithless, that should not be laid to his charge. My dear wife had too much respect for Mr. Rowley, to say anything in reply to his remark; but she told me afterwards, that if any other person had offered such an apology for the minister, she would not have let it pass so easily. "Yet, my dear Edward," added she, "perhaps there is no one less capable than myself of forming a true judgment respecting Sir Robert Walpole, for I have long disliked him; and now, the only sentiment I can entertain towards him, must be that of indignation."

On the following morning, I saw Captain Knight, having deemed it proper to enter fully with him on the subject: I therefore made him acquainted with all the circumstances of the case; and concluded what I had to say, by signifying my intention to go forward in two or three days. He then told me, that on his arrival at Jamaica, he received orders to hold himself in readiness to proceed with despatches to Seaward Islands, and then return; but on the arrival of a frigate from England, he was informed that there was also another service for him to perform. At length, he received his despatches for Seaward Islands, and at the same time was charged with a letter to the Governor of Carthagera. "I understand," said he, "the official letter goes crying peccavi; but I believe the whole business of these apologies to be a ruse; for I have received a Mr. Rentone on board, who came out from England in the frigate, by order of the Admiralty. He is instructed to make himself master of the localities of Carthagera and Porto Bello, and the adjacent coasts; with which already he is pretty well acquainted: and I am directed to give him all the facilities in my power." "Surely," added he, "this looks something like an Irish apology—Coffee and pistols for two."—"I am glad to hear this, Captain Knight," I replied; "for I now feel strengthened in the determination I had made, not to compromise the honour of my sovereign and my country, by any dirty concessions in the name of the King; which baseness, I perceive, all parties by this time are pretty well convinced, tends only to increase the insolence of Spain and her officers, towards us."

It was then settled that I should accompany him first to Carthagena, that place being to windward; from whence we would go down together to Porto Bello. But I gave him to understand that I had resolved to leave the Porghee outside, until I could discover the real mind of the Spanish Governor. When these important matters were arranged, I sent for Drake, and ordered him to be in readiness by Monday.

On Saturday, we had a grand field-day; and on Sunday, the Captain, and officers, and the greater part of the seamen belonging to the sloop of war, attended divine service.

I could not dissuade my Eliza from accompanying me on this hateful duty. The more I pointed out to her the possibility of something unpleasant occurring, the more she persisted in her desire to go with me. In vain I pleaded my sister Mrs. Drake's critical situation. She only replied to this, that she would leave Rosalie with her; and that, besides, my sister would always have other kind friends at hand; but that her duty was to be always near to me. I could not but appreciate her affection, and therefore I yielded to her wish.

On Monday, the 2d of July, our trunks were put on board; in which I did not neglect to place some bags of dollars, and a few doubloons, lest I might find occasion for them. We embarked soon after, and with the first of the sea breeze sailed out of the southern passage; then, after a pleasant run of three days, we made Punta Galera, on the Spanish main, falling in with the land to the eastward, whence we reconnoitred its coast to the west for a couple of days; during which time, almost every day, there was a heavy fall of rain, with violent gusts of wind from the land. Notwithstanding the badness of the weather, the vessels rounded Point Galera, and stood into the bay; Mr. Rentone keeping a sharp look-out on the line of coast, for some days. When off Point Canoa we stood out again to sea; and on the 12th stood in for Carthagena, and received a pilot. The vessels passed through the Bocca Chica (a narrow passage, with strong castles or batteries on each hand going in); then, after some awkward tacking, occasioned by the baffling winds and squally weather, the vessels in a couple of hours sailed with a flowing sheet in to the inner harbour; passing through a channel much narrower than the Bocca Chica, and almost as strongly fortified; having a magnificent castle on the right, with fifty pieces of cannon, and also a formidable battery on the left. In a few minutes after passing this strait, or rather a large shoal that lies beyond it, we came to an anchor, Fort San Lazars bearing north.

The weather being unsettled, detracted much from the pleasure we should have received from the many striking objects which now presented themselves. The buildings appeared superb, the fortifications grand and imposing, the harbour spacious, and the country beyond luxuriant. In the course of a few hours a salute was fired by the sloop of war, and returned by the Castle. Soon after this, Captain Knight went on shore with his letter.

On his return, he came on board the Porghee, and told me the reply he received from the Governor; which was, that he would transmit the letter to Old Spain: his Excellency adding, that, however painful to him, he was obliged to desire that the King of England's vessels (now that they had done the business on which they came) would quit the seas of his Most Catholic Majesty. "This was what the interpreter told me," continued Captain Knight; "but I am sure he did not tell me all; for I heard the Governor repeat, more than once, 'Ah, bellaco!' and when the interpreter asked his Excellency what he said, he replied, 'No digo nada,'—I say nothing. "I suppose," added Captain Knight, "the old Don has twigged us, and he was muttering to himself, bellaco; which, I take it, means war in Spanish."—"I will tell you what it means, when we get out to sea, my good friend," I replied; "but not till then."

Having made but a superficial reconnoitre of Carthage, our two vessels were ordered to quit the port at daylight next morning. And accordingly, by break of day, several Spanish boats took the two vessels in tow; and we had the honour of being escorted by two of their men-of-war brigs, towed out in the same manner. As soon as we were clear of the channel, the boats returned, but the brigs stood out with us to sea. To get rid of these unwelcome companions, Captain Knight made all sail to the northward; and before night we ran them nearly out of sight. As the day closed, our vessels altered their course to south-west; and before daylight we stood in again for the Spanish main, making the land in the evening. For ten days we reconnoitred the nearest shores of the Gulf of Darien; during which time we saw several traders,—most likely smugglers, for they always ran from us; but it was not our object to speak with them. Another week was employed in looking at the coast between the Gulf of Darien and Porto Bello; and having effected this, our vessels stood out at sea ten leagues from the land; stretching in again to make the Isle of Orange, to leeward of the port, so as to afford a full opportunity of observation to Mr. Rentone. This was on Thursday, the 2d of August.

My dear wife and myself now went on board Captain Knight's ship, leaving our things behind in the Porghee, which immediately afterwards stood off to sea, while the sloop of war worked up to the entrance of the harbour alone. Knight now seized the opportunity to ask me what the Governor of Carthagena meant by the expression he had used? "He meant," I replied, "to call somebody rascal? but whether you, or Sir Robert Walpole, or his Majesty, I cannot tell."—"If I had known that, when my ear caught the expression," replied the honest seaman, his eye flashing with indignation, "I would have knocked him down, if I had been sure to hang for it." The trial of his mettle, poor fellow! was nearer at hand than he expected. On our arrival within the shot of Iron Fort, the Spaniards fired, and we hove to, our colours having been hoisted all day. Soon after, a boat came on board to demand our business; and the officer having heard it, answered, that his orders were to warn any English vessels of war, as well as others, off the coast; and he was sure the Governor would not allow us to go in. However, we might anchor where we were, until he should take in the letters sent from England; after which we should know the pleasure of his Excellency.

I received no communication from the Governor until the next morning. Our situation in the night, from severe gusts of wind, attended by thunder and lightning, had been extremely unpleasant; but it was paradise to the situation that awaited us. Boats were sent at ten o'clock to tow us in, the wind blowing directly out of the harbour. We were brought to anchor near the shore, close to the town on its western side, under Gloria Castle. Preliminary arrangements were now made for my reception at Government-house ; but the salute which Captain Knight offered was refused ; at least, they would not promise to return it, which amounted to the same thing.

My audience was fixed for the afternoon, after the great Dons had dined, and smoked, and taken their siesta. So, accordingly, at half-past three o'clock, after receiving an affectionate and cheering word from my beloved Eliza, I accompanied Captain Knight in his pinnace on shore, where we were met by an officer, who attended us to the Alcazar or Government-house. We were ushered in here without the least respect ; no guard turned out—no person whatever in the ante-room to receive us, but negroes in livery. The officer who had accompanied us from the landing-place (it seems merely to show us the way) now walked into the audience-room, desiring us to follow him. Here we saw the great man, and ten or a dozen other persons, in blue uniform with red lining, walking about. As soon as we made our appearance, three or four of them sat down. The situation in which we were placed, thus became at once extremely disagreeable. I looked at Captain Knight, and he at me ; but not a word was spoken for a considerable time. At last, not under the influence of the best feelings, I addressed the Governor in plain English :—"Is your Excellency disposed to receive my mission in the spirit of friendship—in the same spirit in which I am directed by the minister of the King of England to wait on you ?" To which I received the following reply, through an interpreter present :—"You are sent to me by the English Government as a culprit, to make apologies and restitutions for the insults and injuries committed by people, under your orders, two years ago.—What have you to say for yourself?" On hearing this, Captain Knight stood forward, "with fire in his eye and defiance on his front." "Do you know, Governor," said he, "that you are speaking to Sir Edward Seaward, a person equal in rank to yourself, and holding most honourable commissions from his Majesty the King of England?" The interpreter was embarrassed: but did, I believe, explain faithfully. "Equal in rank to me!" was the Spaniard's reply; "I do not consider the King of England himself, equal in rank to me!—what is he?—he is little better than a Dutchman!" At the moment the reply was made known by the interpreter, the honest and gallant sailor broke out,—“You d—d blackguard! do you dare thus to speak of my King, in my presence?” The interpreter on hearing this, ran out of the room: Knight followed him, and brought him back, saying—“Tell him; d—n him, tell him what I said.” By this time, the Governor, and the other three Hidalgos, were on their legs. The trembling interpreter repeated the exclamation of Captain Knight, in Spanish. The Governor, without hesitating, then called in some soldiers, that were conveniently placed in an adjoining hall, and ordered them to secure the English Captain. “Tenez! Tenez!” said I, following up what I had to say, in French; “if you take this step, here ends the conference; and look you, Don Francisco Martinez de Retez, to the consequences; for you were the aggressor, by insulting the King our master.” The soldiers stood off. “Then, sir,” replied the Governor to me, “what is it you desire to offer, as an apology and compensation for the insult and injury we sustained at your hands?”—“What is it you desire of me, sir?” I replied. “You must ask my pardon for yourself,” returned he, in the most contemptuous tone; “and the pardon of our most august monarch, the King of all the Indies, on the part of the King of England; and pay down ten thousand dollars, as the ransom of the people you dared to take away." I hesitated for some time before I made a reply. "Surely, Sir Edward," exclaimed my gallant companion, "you are never going to comply with this!" I made him no answer; but as soon as I could make my mind up to the subject, seeing the situation in which we were placed, I said,—“I will ask your pardon, Don Francisco, as far as respects myself, and I will pay you the ten thousand dollars; but so far from asking pardon of the King of Spain, on behalf of my august master, I tell you, that unless you ask my pardon for the insult you have just offered to the King of England, by what you have said, I have only to say to you, that I will depart.” I spoke this in French; he desired me to repeat it in English, which I did; and immediately on the interpreter giving it in Spanish, he ordered both Captain Knight and myself to be arrested. There were a dozen soldiers at this time in the hall, besides the officers waiting on the Governor; and although we repelled all manual insult, yet seeing that it would be worse than useless to offer further resistance, we allowed ourselves to be marched off out of his presence. We, however, could not believe that this savage was in earnest, to act so in contumacy of all established law between nations; therefore expected that after having thus shown his power over us, he would send us away: but we were mistaken; the guard lodged us in a horrible prison, in two separate cells, for they could not be called rooms, and a sentinel was placed at each door.

In a few minutes after my incarceration, I felt all the horrors of my situation; but they had reference only to the distress in which this transaction must involve my beloved wife; and the dreadful uncertainty of what might ensue to her. And about this time I heard the firing of cannon, which added much to my embarrassment and misery. After a while, I wrote a note in pencil to the Governor; I wrote another to my wife, and sent for the keeper of the prison. When he came, I gave them to him, with a promise of reward should he deliver them safely and quickly: but they never were delivered at all. Two of the most miserable and sleepless nights and days ensued, without my being able to obtain the slightest information of my life's angel. I could not eat; I could not think; I could not even pray;—all my faculties were benumbed, or absorbed in the sense of my present wretchedness.

At a moment when I was first inspired to raise my heart to God, my beloved wife burst into my cell, followed by the keeper of the prison as in pursuit. Speechless, fainting, and out of breath, she threw herself into my arms. Almost at the same instant, the gaoler, who followed close at her heels, laid hold on her by the neck: instinctively, I fetched him a blow with my clenched hand, that stretched him on the floor; from whence he arose, muttering, and departed. I closed the door after him as quickly as possible, and fastened it on the inside as well as I could. Our time was but short together: it was passed in tears, and embraces, and silence. The door, soon and suddenly, was forced open. The gaoler and a body of soldiers as suddenly rushed in upon us. The miscreant I had struck, held a rapier in his hand, with which he instantly made a lunge at me, and wounded me in the side. The soldiers, at the same instant, seized my dear wife, and bore her away, leaving me no consolation but the hope that she did not perhaps know I was wounded. My wound was a blessing to me: it attracted my attention in some degree, and thereby gave some relief to the agony of my mind, which otherwise would have been intolerable. No one came near me all day. I bled a good deal; but I soon felt satisfied that the sword had not passed into my chest, but only through the outer flesh of the ribs; and I therefore ventured to hope, as I was likely to survive this violence, that our God, in mercy, would in the end restore me to my beloved and faithful wife; and finish this awful dispensation with grace and blessedness:—"if not in this world," said I to myself, with a deep sigh, "certainly in the next."

I now fell asleep. After it was dark, I was awakened by an officer, who had brought a surgeon with him. My wound was examined and dressed. I asked these visitors some questions in English, and in French, and tried the effect of a Spanish word or two that I happened to know; but I could get no reply. They ordered some lemonade, which was brought to me while they were present; and they then went away. The blood I had lost tended to cool the fever of my brain; I prayed to God for the preservation of my dear Eliza, and again went to sleep.

In the night I awoke to all the agonies of my situation; I fancied a thousand horrors, as to the fate and situation of my best beloved on earth. A fever supervened; and I recollect no more, until I recognised her one day, sitting by my side on a couch, in an apartment I had never seen before. On the return of consciousness from a state of delirium, I looked up at her with a sensation of overpowering joy and amazement, which, no doubt, gave to my look the air of distraction. "Do you not know me my own Edward?" she said, in a voice of anxious tenderness that went to my soul; at the same time stooping and kissing my forehead, as she was often wont to do in happier days. I could only press her hand, as a token of my returning sense, while the tears unconsciously rolled down my cheeks. From this moment, my eyes, which had been either red or glassy, began to assume their natural moisture and expression; and soon I became sufficiently alive to the past, to inquire what had befallen her; and then to ask about our companions, and the sloop of war, and whether anything was known respecting Drake. To all of which she only replied,—“All is well, my honoured husband; we are in the hands of God our Father, who will not suffer his people to perish. When you are a little stronger, I shall have great satisfaction in answering you to all these, but not now.” She then kissed my cheek, and gave me a dose of medicine, which the Spanish doctor had prescribed for me.

In a few days I recovered strength enough to sit up, and soon after to go to the windows. I felt no little surprise in seeing thence, the town and harbour of Porto Bello at a distance below me on the one side, and nothing but trees and hills in every direction on the other. My dear wife informed me that we were in a deserted monastery, to which the Spaniards had sent me, on some other persons being committed to the prison; that she, on being torn from me by the soldiers, had been conveyed to an adjacent nunnery; and that, on my life being despaired of, the Lady Abbess had made intercession with the Governor, through his confessor, to permit her to go to me. “And I bless God, my dear Edward,” continued she, “that the living principle of Christianity is to be found among those who desire to be devoted to Christ, even among Papists.”

My recovery was slow; for the place in which we were, had been abandoned by the Friars, its former occupants, on account of its unhealthiness. This solitude in the wilderness, was almost always enveloped in a dense atmosphere until noon. Vegetation and reptile life seemed to claim the unmolested dominion of so sequestered a spot. No animals were to be seen; but the trees were most luxuriant, yet choked with every kind of underwood and weeds, while the serpents hissed, and the bull-frogs croaked horribly in every direction. Mosquitos, too, incessantly buzzed around us; while the centipedes, and the scorpions, and the ants, disputed with us the possession of every morsel of food or fruit that might be put away for a future repast. One old lay brother and one negro woman had, indeed, been left to look after the place; but infirmities and indolence made either of little use. However, the kind ladies of the near nunnery supplied us liberally with every thing I could desire; while my beloved wife watched over me with a tenderness that nothing on earth but the kind heart of woman can bestow. Yet the air was bad, and therefore every thing else was unavailing. My beloved, too, began to have ague, and to droop; on seeing this, the little strength I had acquired, gave way, and my heart sunk within me. Now humbled before God, I became calm and resigned, and seemed to feel no wish beyond that of being laid with her in the same grave, and meeting her in heaven.

When all appeared lost on earth, the good Lady Abbess, with the Governor's confessor, Padre Guircino, came to us with a letiga, and some mules, by which we were conveyed to the house of a fisherman near the sea. They had bargained with this honest man for our lodging; who, together with his wife, received us in the kindest manner. My dear Eliza was carried on the letiga, or lechiga, a sort of bed, between two mules. She not only bore the journey well, but seemed to inhale new life as we approached the sea-shore. In a few weeks she was able to walk out a little; and my strength had considerably improved; but both of us still had ague; sometimes every third, sometimes every fourth day, in spite of Jesuit's-bark; with which we were most kindly supplied by the Spanish doctor, who continued to visit us occasionally. The fisherman's hut was situated about a quarter of a mile from the extreme end of Point Cocal, having a little bay on either side of it, as well to the northward, as to the southward. Some islands lay off the point; and shoals and reefs appeared nearly all round, finishing only about half a mile to the southward, where there is a small tower. In one or other of these bays, our kind host went early every morning, to cast his nets for sprats, which swarmed on the coast; and it was our amusement often to accompany him.

At intervals, during this period, my dear wife made me acquainted with the circumstances, as far as she knew, of what had taken place after Captain Knight and myself were sent to prison. Immediately on our arrest, soldiers were sent off to take possession of the sloop of war, but were repulsed by the crew. On which, Gloria Castle fired into her, and several of her men were killed or wounded. The brig instantly cut her cable without firing a shot, as she could not bring any of her guns to bear on the castle, without firing on the upper part of the town; and at this moment a boat came off, to tell the commanding officer, if he did fire on the town, the Governor would hang every Englishman in his power. My dear wife, thinking alone of me, jumped into this boat, and the brig made sail to get out of the harbour; which she might have effected; but foolishly heaving to, to return the fire of Iron Fort, was hit by the shot: then falling to leeward, got on the shoals to the southward nearly opposite, where she struck her colours and surrendered. However, before the ensign was hauled down, she contrived to send off a boat with Mr. Rentone, in hope of its falling in with the Porghee; and soon after, it is supposed, the brig filled and foundered. My dear Eliza had been escorted to the Government-house by the Spanish officer, who had conveyed her on shore. But even her celestial influence produced little effect on the savages who inhabited there, the Governor's wife included; so that all she could accomplish, was a permission to retire to a convent until the Governor might be pleased to release me. And it was on her way thither that she had been able, by the power of the only doubloon, which she happened to have in her pocket, to prevail on the persons who accompanied her, to go with her to the prison, and find out where I was lodged.

She had been told, moreover, that some English had, some time ago, landed in the night, about half a mile to the southward of Point Cocal, and there surprised a small tower, making the officer and guard prisoners; that the party afterwards pushed on for the town of Porto Bello, round the Block-House Hill. But, being forewarned of their danger by approaching daylight, they returned without being able to accomplish their purpose. "This place, then," continued she, "was the scene of the exploit, and that tower we now see, the post that was surprised and taken." This she concluded to have been Drake. And it was in consequence of this, her informant said, that all the officers of the sloop of war were sent to share my prison. But I apprehend Don Francisco Martinez des Retez, did not require any motive beyond his own barbarity, for this further act of severity to my countrymen.

Three months had passed away since our unfortunate visit to this place, when we had the additional misfortune to hear, what perhaps would have given me pleasure in any other situation, that hostilities had actually commenced between the two countries, England and Spain, and that a declaration of war was daily expected.

I now began to contemplate some scheme of making our escape: and I suggested to my dear wife the expediency of raising money somehow or other, to enable us to do so: but she advised me to be still, and put my trust in the providence of God; for at present we were placed in a peaceful and healthy obscurity, by the kind interposition of that providence. "And, perhaps," added she, "the least stir might throw us back amidst those horrible woods, or into that prison from which you have been so mercifully delivered." I readily yielded to this pious, and therefore wise counsel; and having nothing better to do, we continued to amuse ourselves in accompanying the fisherman, and in assisting him to mend his nets.

On the morning of Wednesday, the 21st of November, the weather being now settled and fine, my dearest Eliza and myself arose early, and went down with the fisherman to the beach. Before we had reached it, he pointed out some ships in the offing, not however making any remark as to what they might be, but went into the boat with his son, and took out his nets. My wife and myself sat down the while upon a large stone, regarding the ships with wishful eyes, yet scarcely daring to hope they were come for our deliverance. As the breeze freshened, the ships approached the opposite coast, the smaller vessels standing in ahead of the others; and, O! how it cheered my heart to recognise the Porghee, at that very moment among the foremost.

The Spanish fort soon began to fire. The smaller vessels came over, near to the side where we were, where some of them anchored close to the edge of the reef, hoisting at the same time a chequered flag at the fore. The large ships kept on the other side, and soon closed one after another with Hiero Castle. The firing was awful. Our affrighted friend, the fisherman, quickly returned to the beach, asking me what all that could mean. Then calling aloud on San Gieronimo for succour and protection, he entreated us to leave the beach, and come up to his house as a place of greater safety. But my eyes were riveted on the scene of action; my heart beat high in witnessing the noble efforts of my countrymen. And while the fisherman invoked his saint, my Eliza called upon Him, who has said, "Vengeance is mine," to punish the oppressors. We kept our position, looking steadily at the awful combat, till the firing ceased; and the instant the smoke cleared away, we discerned the English colours flying on the walls of the Spanish castle. On seeing this, my Eliza and myself both raised our hands to Heaven, in token of the feeling that actuated us, but we spoke not a word. The firing was now heard by us in the direction of the town, where some of the ships were evidently engaged with the other forts. The firing continued nearly all day; during which, notwithstanding the success our eyes had witnessed, we were agitated to a degree not to be described—we trembled for the safety of our friend Drake, but our whole soul was moved for the result of the daring enterprise.

In the evening, Padre Guircino came to the fisherman's hut, and told us the place was taken by the English;—O, what blessed news for us!—and he begged of me to go with him immediately to his monastery; and Lady Seaward to go to the Convent of St. Anna, where the Lady Abbess impatiently awaited her arrival, as they expected nothing less than a general pillage and misusage. Almost without power of utterance,—though our eyes, and our hands clasped in each other, told our happy feelings,—we accompanied him, and disposed ourselves according to his request; for we owed our lives to him, and to the charitable woman who now desired the protection of my wife's presence.

In the evening, the Castle of Gloria opened its gates to the British flag, and the redoubtable Don Francisco Martinez de Retzez surrendered himself and Porto Bello to the gallant Vernon! but there was neither pillage nor misusage.

On the morning of the 22d, I had the heartfelt delight of seeing, from the windows of the monastery, the English colours flying on Gloria Castle, and at Fort Jeronimo, and six fine two-decked men of war, besides smaller vessels, all bearing the British flag, riding proudly in the harbour. Is not our country's glory every man's glory? How my heart swelled with honest pride, when I beheld this glorious sight!

Towards the afternoon I wrote a note to the Admiral, stating my case and situation to him as concisely as possible. To which I received an immediate answer, requesting my presence at the Government-house as soon as convenient. I only stopped to send a few lines to my dear wife, and then waited on the Admiral, dressed in my old tattered uniform, dirty and blood-stained; accompanied only by the officer who brought me the welcome reply. Captain Knight was there before me. He also had been ill: we were shocked when we looked upon each other. The Admiral came in at the moment of our meeting, and Commodore Brown was with him, who had seen me at Jamaica. Without preamble, the brave Vernon expressed his indignation at the treatment we had received; then instantly summoned the Spanish Governor to attend. This hidalgo shortly after entered a prisoner of war, into the very room where we had last seen him so haughty and vindictive, attended by some of the very men, who were now with him sharers in his captivity.

A sort of ring was now formed, with the Spanish Governor in the centre, his interpreter standing by his side.—“I have no quarrel with Don Francisco Martinez de Retzez,” said I, “on my own account; but I have, and ever shall have, a quarrel with him on account of the King, my master; whom he most grossly insulted, by disrespectful words, in the presence of Captain Knight and myself; and for the resenting of which, we have endured, as it was our duty so to do, the severest treatment at his hands.”—“What did he say?” exclaimed the Admiral. “He first insulted Sir Edward Seaward, by the most insolent and contemptuous behaviour,” replied Captain Knight; “and when I remonstrated, telling him, that he should recollect that Sir Edward Seaward was equal in rank to himself, holding honourable commissions under the King of England, he replied, —‘I do not consider the King of England himself equal in rank to me; for he is little better than a Dutchman.’” Old Vernon, on hearing this, instantly turned round upon his Excellency Don Francisco Martinez de Retzez, with a voice of thunder,—“You d—d poltroon! with all your long yarn of hard names, what shall I call you? Down on your marrow-bones, you scoundrel, and beg pardon of these gentlemen, and of the King our master, or I’ll kick you from Hell to Hackney! Tell him that,” said he to the interpreter. The interpreter was dumb-founded: however, the looks and menaces of the Admiral left little to be interpreted. After some pause and explanation, this mighty Don asked pardon of Captain Knight and myself, but he would do no more. This would not satisfy the Admiral, who insisted on his eating the words he had spoken disrespectfully of his Majesty; at the same time taking a guinea from his pocket, he threw it on the floor, saying,—“There is the King’s picture! down on your knees, you blackguard, and ask forgiveness;" laying hold of the Spaniard by the neck as he spoke, and bending him to the ground. The astounded Governor took up the guinea from the floor; then putting it down again, said, in a muffled voice,—"Yo he ofendido." This was considered as sufficient; and the question, so far, set at rest. I now demanded my sword; which was valuable to me, not only on account of its gold hilt, but because it had been touched by the hand of her Majesty, the late Queen, who had curiously admired its workmanship. I immediately received an assurance that it should be returned; and it was, together with the side-arms of Captain Knight.

On quitting the Government-house with my fellow-sufferer, we met Drake, crossing the Prado, who had been making inquiry for us everywhere. On seeing me, he stood still; but as we approached near to him, he burst into tears. "Cheer up, my good fellow," cried Knight; "All's well! you see we are alive and kicking." Drake threw himself on my neck, saying,—"I hope all is well! Is Lady Seaward well?"—"All is well, my dear Drake," I replied: "you shall soon see her." We now bent our steps to the Convent of Santa Anna. On our way, among other questions, Captain Knight asked Drake, if he knew anything of Rentone; for he was not here among the prisoners from the Marten. My friend told him he had picked him up at sea, and that he was now here in the fleet. On our arrival at the convent, we were met in the vestibule by my happy wife, and the Lady Abbess. She brought us some sweetmeats, and cool drink made of red sorrel; by which, and this blessed meeting of long separated friends, we were much refreshed both in body and mind.

I took this opportunity of walking apart with Drake.

He told me, that after he had picked up the Marten's boat with Mr. Rentone, he made an unsuccessful attempt to assist us. But on seeing the destruction of the Marten, he made the best of his way to Jamaica, with the account of what had happened. "Yet," he added, "up to this hour, I do not know how or why it did happen!—however, I reported the business, as much as I knew and could conjecture of it, to the Commodore and Governor of Jamaica; and asked permission to be permitted to embark all the force of Seaward Islands, in the vessels that belonged to the place, and make an attack on Porto Bello, to attempt your rescue. But I was told," continued he, "that the scheme was a mad one; and I had something like an assurance that there should be no occasion for it. I then received orders to visit Seaward Islands, but to return to Jamaica; which I did before the end of September. On my arrival there, I learnt that orders of reprisal had been issued against Spain; and I became desirous, of course, to get out to sea, for a chance of making prizes; but the Commodore would not allow me to stir. I confess I was much chagrined at this usage, while all the other vessels were sent out in every direction; nor could I surmise what was the cause of it. But on the 23d of October, Admiral Vernon made his appearance at Port Royal; and I was then informed why I had been detained. It was to accompany the Admiral's squadron to Porto Bello, to assist, by my local knowledge, in the meditated enterprise. This information," exclaimed my gallant friend, "was more acceptable to me than a thousand galleons; and I now rejoice, my dear Sir Edward, in seeing the noble prize before me—You and She, whom we all devotedly love."

"We must leave this hateful place, my dear friend," said I, "as soon as possible. Have you any money on board?"—"I have," he replied; "and the money and clothes belonging to you and Lady Seaward, which were embarked when you came here." I then desired him to send us some clothes, and a bag of dollars; and told him I would write to the Admiral, to give us permission to depart, without loss of time. Drake now left us: and as the ships were in too great confusion, in consequence of the late action with the forts, to receive us, I was glad still to leave my dear wife with the Lady Abbess; and I took my friend Knight with me to the monastery of the Franciscans; where he, as well as myself, was well received by Padre Guircino and his associates.

In the afternoon some clothes arrived for myself and Lady Seaward, and a bag of 1000 dollars. I shared my clothes with Captain Knight; and, after much entreaty, prevailed on him to accept 100 dollars, to meet his present emergencies. But he would only take this small sum as a loan, although I had wished him to accept 500 as a present,—in consideration of his having suffered the loss of all his things, his ship, and his health also, on my account: but he objected, saying,—“It was only in the way of his duty; and as he had more than six months’ pay now due to him, he should have money enough by-and-by. But if I chose to lend him the 100 dollars, he would thank me.” He therefore had them on his own terms.

We now treated ourselves to a shave and a good wash, and put on some clean linen, and a suit each of handsome clothes. The good Friars sent into the town, at my request, and procured us some excellent Spanish shoes, and a couple of sombreros, or cocked hats, in their fashion. In the evening we went to the convent, taking with us two lay brothers of the Franciscans; one of whom carried my dear wife's small trunk, and the other a bag containing 500 dollars. We were met, as before, in the vestibule, and there complimented by the Lady Abbess on our good looks and elegant apparel. The trunk was sent into the convent; and, after the lay brothers had retired, I whispered my dear Eliza—"Here are 500 dollars, which place at the pleasure of that good lady: but tell her, we wish the lay brother, and the negro woman at the deserted monastery, to have 50 each: and we desire that the fisherman and his wife may have 100 each. The other 200 are at the disposal of the Lady Abbess, to relieve the distressed."—"I will give them to her now," returned my dear wife. She then addressed the good lady in French, handing her the bag; which was graciously received, with many commendations for our generosity, and a promise of faithfully applying it. Our hostess gave us chocolate; and as we sat taking it, and conversing, I often saw the nuns peeping at us through the gratings, with an ardent curiosity.

On the following morning I sent for the doctor, to the monastery, and presented him with 100 dollars, in the presence of Padre Guircino. The worthy medico had never seen so large a fee before; therefore his grateful acknowledgments were proportioned. The good Father present, also added his best thanks for my noble conduct towards him, and to all my late benefactors. "But how can I return your kindnesses?" I said. "I am the servant of God," he replied; "you owe me nothing." This was true religion, worthy of imitation by many who despise all that are not so happy as to enjoy the light of our Reformed church.

A little before noon, Captain Knight and myself made a short visit to the convent; from whence we went down into the town, to pay our respects to the Admiral. At first he did not know us; and, on recognising us, he affected not to do so. "Who the devil have we got here?" said he, turning to Captain Knight: "You are a Spanish hidalgo, I suppose!" Poor Knight looked embarrassed, and bowed; then pointing to me, said,— "Sir Edward Seaward has kindly given me a suit of his clothes." The old gentleman laughed heartily; immediately afterwards saying, "Sir Edward, I beg your pardon: it was your long-toed shoes, and three-cornered scrapers that puzzled me." In turn, I made my respects, but in a different way; and concluded by requesting him to allow the Porghee to return with Lady Seaward and myself, to our place of residence as soon as possible, my wife's health being in a precarious state. He instantly complied with my wish; and seemed pleased to take the opportunity of speaking with warm approbation of Lieutenant Drake's conduct, in buoying the entrance to the harbour under a heavy fire from the fort; regretting that, as so few Spanish vessels of war had been found here, there was no promotion for him, although he well deserved it. After this discourse, it was arranged that I might sail to-morrow; and I then took leave of the brave old Admiral, wishing him success in further humbling the haughty spirit of Spain.

In an hour after I had left him, Drake received his orders; and in the evening he came up to the monastery to tell me so. Captain Knight and myself carried the welcome intelligence to my dear wife; and I had then the pleasure to see our kind friends, the fisherman and his wife, in the vestibule, receiving the two hundred dollars from her own hand.

Early in the morning of the 26th, I took leave of the worthy Padre Guircino, and with some difficulty persuaded him to accept a small offering to distribute among the poor lay brothers of his order. Then calling for Lady Seaward, whom I found in waiting for me at the convent door, we bade an affectionate adieu to the benevolent Abbess, and hastened on board our dear little vessel. The sails were already loose, and the anchor a-trip, and in an instant we were under weigh, standing out to sea with a fine breeze. I could not but remark the great number of men on board; on which Drake told me that his complement had been increased to thirty men, and I might observe that he had mounted two of our wall-pieces on his quarter. To God, our thanks arose.

As the high land above Point Porto Bello receded from our view, we descried a ship on our weather bow, steering in. Drake asked me if I thought he should take a look at her, or keep on our course. I answered, —“Certainly, take a look at her; she may prove a prize to you: but take care you are not brought to action by a superior force: recollect who we have with us.”—“I will take care of that,” he replied. Then taking me at my word, he wore, and stood athwart her, having previously hoisted Spanish colours. In less than an hour he came within hail of her: she was a Spanish merchant ship, but mounted eight or ten guns. I confess I did not much like the appearance of this business; but as we stood across him, Drake ordered our proper ensign to be hoisted; then wearing short round, boarded him on the quarter in a moment, and carried him in five minutes, without firing a shot. He was from La Guira, with indigo, cocoa, Peruvian bark, and other merchandise, bound to Porto Bello, having a complement of twenty-four men. The prisoners were soon secured; a prize-master, with a sufficient number of hands, being then put on board, the two vessels stood on quietly to the northward. We rejoiced greatly at the success of our friend Drake, and in the gallant manner the capture had been accomplished.

On the evening of the 29th, the promontory of St. George's Island was discovered by the man at the mast head. We ran in towards it, until the sun had set; when Drake thought it advisable, having the prize to take care of, besides his own vessel, to stand off until the morning. At the distance we were from the land, the sea breeze blew all night; and in the morning it carried us through the channel to within a league of the headlands, before it died away. About eight o'clock it reached us again, and we again made sail; the Porghee having hoisted my flag, the St. George's jack at the fore, but showing a blue ensign, in honour of the gallant Vice-Admiral we had lately quitted. The prize hung out her own colours, with a union jack over them, which now streamed gaily forth from the mizen peak. The colours were up on the promontory—and our hearts were up also.

Before the vessels came within a mile of the harbour's mouth, we saw boats and canoes, large and small, between the headlands, sailing and rowing, and paddling out towards us. The breeze being fresh, the vessels shortened sail, for fear of running them down. In a very short time we passed through amongst them, while they lay by, gazing and cheering, as I waved my hat, and my dear wife her white handkerchief, from the quarter deck on which we stood.

The Porghee had scarcely anchored, when the deck was crowded by those we loved, and by those who loved us unfeignedly. They who could not embrace us, embraced one another, and wept, or looked silently on us, endeavouring to conceal their tears. We were much altered. The sickness and sorrow I had endured at Porto Bello, had made a deep impression on my frame and features, and the people saw it. My dear Eliza, too, worn almost to a shadow, looking not like a thing of earth, but in semblance of a disembodied spirit, stood by my side. Her eyes sympathised with the people; and I, too, was unmanned by the scene. I am not ashamed to confess it.

CHAPTER X.

ONCE more restored to our happy home, with feelings that might be envied by the monarch of a throne, we disembarked; landing hand in hand, amidst the caresses and greetings of our dear relations and not less dear friends and dependants. On reaching the mansion, kind Mr. Rowley, and the Doctor, pressed us to retire to rest for a while, that we might be relieved from the further excitement of seeing any one, until we had recovered from our evident exhaustion. I felt the force of their advice, and immediately complied.

By dinner time we were sufficiently refreshed to meet our friends, and to converse with them on the subject of our late sufferings, and our glorious deliverance. Drake, meanwhile, had merely given them a brief outline of what had happened to us. He had very little time to spare for talk, having to moor his prize, and unbend her sails; so that she might neither be driven from her anchors by the wind, nor be carried away by the Spanish crew in the Porghee's absence, if they dared to rise on the prize-master. I was, therefore, under the necessity of going somewhat into detail; but my dear Eliza took up the theme, and then every one present was moved even to tears.

After we had brought the subject to a close, I could not suppress my anxiety to know the posture of our affairs at home. But Dr. Gordon thought, for the present I ought to be satisfied with knowing that all things had gone on tolerably well; that there was not anything of so much importance to need attention, as the re-establishment of my own health: and he was of opinion I should not engage in any business matters whatever, for some days at least. "I look worse than I am, Doctor," said I; "we shall see what to-morrow may say."—"Then, Sir Edward," whispered Van Kempen, who had stood silently by my chair for an hour, "I shall be right glad to say a word to you to-morrow."—"Say it now, my good friend," I replied, "if it be a matter of any moment to you."—"It is of immediate moment," he replied, "to us all. We must not lose this chance, sir; and if we would not lose the chance, we must not lose the time."—"What is it, Van Kempen?"—"The Porto Bello market, sir. I saw the thing the instant Captain Drake told us the English had taken the place, and I directly spoke to your brother about it; but he left it to me to break the matter to you. I hope, therefore, you will consent to our loading his vessel and mine with all the merchandise in our stores, and proceed forthwith; for all the world will be there in a few weeks." I consented to this proposal, without hesitation, complimenting Van Kempen on his commercial acuteness. Then, after some further conversation with him and my brother on the subject, I allowed them to depart, sending a message to Drake to visit me early in the morning.

Soon after they were gone, Dr. Gordon said, "It was an incumbent duty on him to take care of Lady Seaward and myself: and that rest of mind and of body were essential to the re-establishment of our health: that for the present he would not decide on the medical treatment to be pursued; but he was inclined to think we had taken too much Jesuit's bark, or it had been given injudiciously; by which error the hepatic functions, as he expressed it, had been partially suspended; and he feared that, in consequence, the spleen had begun to enlarge, if he might judge by the peculiar aspect of countenance which that disease uniformly produced." Poor Diego (who, with Rota, had remained as near to us as possible, ever since our arrival,) now ventured to say, "Master Diego hopes Master Doctor will allow him to take Governor, Sir Edward, and his lady, every morning for ride on mules, or for row them about in barge, before breakfast." On this, dear old Rota, stepping forward, put in her word, saying, "And I will have nice chicken, boiled in milk, with little mace, for my lady, and good Master, Sir Edward, when they come back: and that better than doctor physic for them."—"We will discuss your proposals by and by, dame," replied Dr. Gordon; "for the present they must be kept very quiet; and, if you please, Mr. Diego and Mistress Rota, I am the responsible person."

A hostile feeling was getting up between the parties, when dear Mr. Rowley interposed; and after having said what was necessary for peace, our conscientious doctor took leave of us for the evening: on which, both my dear wife and myself thanked our kind and early negro friends for their solicitude; assuring them that, as soon as it appeared advisable, we would profit by their attentions. But Mistress Rota was not to be put off so. She had provided a warm bath for her lady, at her own house; of which she and Rosalie soon apprised my dear wife, who communicated the matter to me: and as I could see no objection to its use, but rather the contrary, she accordingly went: returning, in less than an hour, much refreshed and invigorated by its application.

On the morrow, Dr. Gordon paid us an early visit. He was immediately informed of what had been done; on which he said,—as it had been done, he would refrain from any observations, further than, "it was unadvised: it might have been positively wrong, although it happened not to be so. He, after due consideration, would have recommended it; but as a few degrees of temperature made all the difference between its being wrong or right, even after the thing itself was determined on as appropriate to the case, the temperature and other points connected with its administration required some deliberation." The doctor now proceeded, secundum artem, first with me, and then with Lady Seaward. The pulse was counted, the tongue examined, the liver and spleen pressed upon by his hand: sometimes we were desired to make a deep inspiration, sometimes to sneeze. This being done, he sat down for half an hour without speaking a word. As he looked more grave than usual, my dear wife at last addressed him:—"Dr. Gordon, if you think Sir Edward's case serious, I insist on your telling me so unequivocally, that he may immediately return to England."—"Indeed no, madam," he replied; "I think, by small doses of sweet mercury and Turkey rhubarb, and the warm salt-water bath, at a temperature of ninety-six degrees, with gentle exercise on the beasts you have here, taking a sail or a row now and then upon the water, observing a milk diet chiefly, and relaxation of mind—on the part of Sir Edward—you both may very soon be pretty well again. But I cannot say," continued he, after pausing a minute, "that either the one or the other of you will be just so well as before you had the fever at Porto Bello."

When the Doctor left us, Master Diego and our kind Rota were overjoyed to find how much there was for them to do. The old lady prepared a bath for me, without loss of time, which appeared the shorter, as Drake was with me during the interval. The business of our interview, related to the going of our merchant vessels to Porto Bello. It was determined that Drake should accompany them in the Porghee, and take with him fifteen of his prisoners. This measure was called for, to afford our traders some protection, and also to give Drake an opportunity of making known his good fortune to the Admiral, whose share of it was not inconsiderable; and to learn his pleasure as to what port or place he would desire the prize to be sent; which had been ascertained to be of considerable value, not less than eighty thousand dollars. Drake now went on his business, and I repaired to the bath.

On my return I was met by my dear sister, with her baby. The sight of the little innocent, cooing and springing in its mother's arms, gave me inexpressible pleasure. I thought its eyes so like those of my Eliza, that I felt as if I could gaze on them for ever. "You will call it Eliza, my dear sister," said I, as I looked wistfully upon the sweet angel.—"Yes, brother," she replied, "most willingly; it was Drake's wish that I should do so, and I am now doubly happy in knowing that it is yours also. Besides, it is the wish of my own heart," continued she, going over to my dear wife, and kissing her as she spoke: "it will make me happy to call my child Eliza, for you know how much I love you: and I will teach the babe to be sensible of your great kindnesses, both to me and to her father."

My brother and Van Kempen were so busy in loading their vessels, that I did not see them till the evening; so I suppose they either dined with Van Kempen's vrow, or took a pork sausage with Gortz, hot from the coals. Mrs. Seaward, however, was with us; and we were happy in being able to sit down with her, and my sister, and Drake, and our other kind and worthy guests, to dinner. The warm bath had been of essential service to both of us, so that we were able to eat comfortably.

Doctor Gordon came in, accompanied by my brother and Van Kempen, in the evening, bringing with him a bolus for each of us, which we were to take at night. After handing these bullets to me, he said, "I should not break in upon my own rules; but I cannot help submitting to you, Sir Edward, a question that stands between these gentlemen here and myself, as fiscal for the colony. They are shipping goods that never paid the ad valorem duty, having been in store before the impost. But I say it was an oversight, that they were not rated; and now they are going to market, it is but fair those goods should pay as well as the others. They object to this." — "Why do you object to it, Mr. Van Kempen?" said I. "Because," he replied, "such a measure would be unlawful. We have no duty on exports, and the goods in question were landed before the regulation was made; and to make those goods pay, would be making laws retrospective, which would be admitting a principle destructive of all commercial confidence. Yet I do not deny," continued he, "that it was an oversight not to include the goods in store; but such oversights are common, both in England and Holland, and there is no remedy in strict justice. The government may profit by the mistake, in making its future enactments; and that may be some compensation—I know no other. But, Sir Edward," added he, after a moment's pause, "I am not personally interested. The point in question is entirely with Mr. Seaward; all my goods have paid the impost." — "Well," exclaimed my brother, "Doctor Gordon has said more about it than the thing is worth. The whole value of the goods in question does not amount to above 100 dollars: and I would rather pay the fiscal the one dollar demanded, than hear any more about it." — "Your pardon, I hope, Mr. Seaward," replied the honest fiscal, "all I said was in the line of my duty. If

Sir Edward Seaward thinks Mr. Van Kempen's view of the case right, it would not be honest to take your money, sir: I am but the fiscal." A smile rose on my lip, at the earnestness of these three men upon a point that never could occur again; which consideration, together with the smallness of the sum in question, rendered it a matter of no moment; but the subject had been brought before me as important. I therefore gravely gave my decision, "That there could be no impost levied on goods imported prior to the laying on of the duty, but that the fiscal was right to look sharp after the revenue of the colony, even to a fraction."

This subject being set at rest, I told our merchants that Captain Drake would convoy their vessels to Porto Bello, as soon as they could be got ready. Then, pleading indisposition, I left them, and joined my Eliza in her own room, to which she had already retired. There I found her with Rosalie, and our dear little dog, playing on a fine large palm-leaved mat, that had been made for us by Ximenes in our absence. I was not ashamed to join the innocent party, but sat down among them, till Fidele by his kisses and caresses drove me from my position, to the great amusement of Rosalie, and delight of my Eliza. But we had now to take Doctor Gordon's boluses. They were little less than a musket ball: it was impossible to swallow them. After some deliberation, we proposed to chew them, as they were principally rhubarb, and wash them down with a cup of coffee, which we both effected tolerably well; and in this way we contrived to take the medicine, as long as the Doctor thought necessary to prescribe it, which might be about three weeks. I often spoke to him, to put it in some other form; but he uniformly objected, saying, "It is the deobstruent bolus, and therefore cannot be other than a bolus." To this pharmaceutical dogma we were obliged to submit, although the folly of it was evident; for, had we not fallen on the expedient of the coffee, by which it was no longer a bolus, we either must have been choked by the remedy, or deprived altogether of its benefit.

In a few days the vessels sailed for Porto Bello. It was on the 4th of December. I seized on the opportunity to send half a dozen of my best sheep to the Admiral, with a handsome private letter, in addition to the public one, on the subject of our two vessels going to his port. Van Kempen accompanied the expedition in his galliot, as super-cargo both of his own and my brother's merchandise, with full power to sell and buy as he might think proper. I was glad to see in this that James had got over those narrow views of trade which fasten naturally on the minds, not only of individuals, but of nations. It is the selfish principle, which never fails ultimately to miss its object, as well in commerce as in every other branch of human intercourse.

After the departure of the vessels, I was glad to find myself able to attend at intervals to the details of what had happened, and to what had been doing during my long absence from the settlement; but my recovery to anything like active health was slow; and my dear Eliza continued not only weak, but still experienced some ague fits, generally every-fourth day. Doctor Gordon now thought it expedient in her case to resume the exhibition of the Jesuit's bark. However, our recovery, though tardy, was progressive; so that in less than a month we were able to attend divine service under the hallowed canopy of the great tree; and we soon not only enjoyed the morning row upon the lake, in Diego's barge, and the afternoon's sail in the Avon beyond the headlands out to sea, but we again took a morning bath of refreshing sea water, and immediately after a bowl of new milk from the goats, followed by a ride. And thus we gradually acquired something of our former elasticity of mind and body.

As my strength increased, my spirits improved; and the former deep interest I had taken in every body, and every thing, at this place, returned unimpaired. I again felt my heart warm in the business; so that every detail, even respecting an ass's foal, was listened to by me with pleasure. But it necessarily fell out that there were things unpleasant, as well as things pleasant, to hear. It were, however, ungrateful to Providence not to acknowledge that the evils were few, considering the many to which man is exposed, as well in his collective as in his individual station of life.

Sickness had certainly been more prevalent during my absence than usual; in consequence of which, one of the women from Carolina had died, and two of the German children. But Diego had a serious visitation to impart to me, worse than the plague of the small-pox. The place was over-run with rats; and he could not imagine whence they came. They destroyed the corn, and had completely ruined the little patches of sugar-cane below the cotton-tree; but, happily, they had not appeared either on Edward's Island, or at Peccary Field. Unfortunately there were not any cats in the settlement. Hitherto I had not allowed any to be brought to it, as there was no natural prey for them, neither rats nor mice; and I did not desire to see the native doves and nightingales driven by grimalkin from our doors. But I now wished that some adventurous Whittington might come to the port with a cargo of tabbies; and in the humour I was in, when Diego had imparted the information to me, I think I should have given him his own price for the investment, although I might know my conscientious fiscal would not remit one fraction on the ad valorem duty, if it were to save his own nose from being gnawed off by the vermin.

There were, however, some small dogs at German Town, and Allwood's Bay; and as Fidele had already killed a few of the intruders, we might expect a similar service from his humbler fellows. "When we get in crop, sir," said Diego, "you give me dogs; and Jemmy Purdy, he famous rat-catcher, sir; we then dig all them out, and kill every one. Donna Rata always live under cane roots, sir, and about in holes." When the time for taking up the crops came, which soon arrived, Diego marshalled his forces; but the matter was of too much importance to be left to Purdy and the dogs. A levy en masse was required, by which we formed a cordon round our little plantation. As the rats were dug out, or started, the dogs generally caught hold of them, but the creatures were very large and powerful, and bit sharply, so that sometimes the dogs let them go. Purdy, however, always killed his rat: he caught it adroitly, and grasped it fearlessly, throwing it with great force into the air, never failing to strike it as it came down, with a short stick he held in his left hand, which he suddenly shifted over to the right. "Hit him at once, with your stick, while he is on the ground Purdy," said I, "instead of killing him as you do."—"Can't, sir," he replied; "he stop for me to put hand on him; won't stop to hit him with stick: and if I hit him with stick when I catch him, if I don't kill him dead he will bite me to the bone." And this was true enough; for although the people were armed with sticks, and the rats passed closely among them, not above two were struck and killed; and one negro was bit severely, who had caught a rat with the hand, and then struck it with his stick while he had hold of it. When the enterprise was finished, although the dogs and Purdy had killed nearly thirty, I was convinced as many more had escaped: a formidable horde of barbarians, sufficient to procreate a host equal to the destruction of every thing belonging to us, if not ourselves also.

This great evil still hung over the colony. The sickness had passed away, and the deaths in consequence of the sickness had been few, and of importance only to their immediate connexions; but I was thankful that it ended here, for our good and useful pastor had been spared, who with his whole family had been in great danger, not long after our departure for Porto Bello.

An accession of five families from Kingston, Jamaica, had been made in my absence. They were all people of colour, that is, Mulattoes, and had been induced to come, through the representations of the elder Allwood; who had made a trip in my brother's schooner. Being all poor, and only two of the men having trades, they were at present subsisted, as all the others formerly had been, by the produce of the silk-cotton tree plantation, and from the stores at my expense. But I was glad, nevertheless, to hear of this accession to our numbers; which in my mind was always important to the ultimate well-being, and security of the settlement. Allwood had taken one of the families to live with him; my brother had located another, on his own lands near to the German Town Pass. Two families were lodged in the village, in separate houses, there being now eighteen houses completed. One of the men was a tailor; the other I do not know what to call him; he said he was a millwright, but he was also a tolerable good smith; and there was reason to suspect he had been a slave on some plantation in Jamaica, brought up to the anvil, under his master's white workmen. In consequence, I instituted an inquiry, but as I never could get at the truth of the matter, I chose rather to run the risk of letting him remain quietly where he was, than send him back to Kingston. Still I felt, that although I did not encourage slavery, nor allow it at Seaward Islands, yet it was not for me to permit Mr. Allwood, nor any one else among us, to believe that I would connive at the desertion of slaves from their masters in Jamaica; whose legal property I was bound to consider them, how repugnant soever it might be to my feelings as a man and a Christian, to do so. The fifth family had gone to German Town. Matthew Hinklemann, the husband of the Flemish woman, having wished to reside in the village, and to keep shop under the auspices of Van Kempen, he therefore let his house and lot at German Town, to this man, for a consideration, and engaged to pay rent for the house he had taken in the village. This is the outline respecting these five families, which altogether amount to twenty-one persons. No time had been lost in sending their children to the school-house, where they were now, in common with others, learning to read, to sew, and to make plait for hats. Mr. Rowley had baptized them all, and married the heads of the families, who, hitherto, had lived together merely by consent, as is the custom with all negroes and people of colour in Jamaica.

About a month previous to my return, a discovery of some consequence had been made at German Town, by Adrian Wor and William Schwartz. In process of time, the few pipes brought by the Germans, had become quite useless, being either worn out, or broke entirely. And this, to them was a great privation, as they found but puny comfort in a cigar. Adrian Wor, by accident, found some good clay below the rocky face of the hill east of the town, with which he contrived to make a few short shapeless pipes. These, with the assistance of Schwartz, he managed to burn tolerably well, and gave them, as he made them, to his friends and countrymen. The two men having accomplished this great matter, tried their hand at fabricating some brown dishes, which, after a few failures and further perseverance, and a lesson from Hart the bricklayer, as to the necessity of mixing sand with the clay, they succeeded so well, that when the business was mentioned to me by Doctor Gordon, I desired that Hart should go over to German Town, with a load of bricks in the Avon, and erect a spacious kiln for these men; which he did, and finished it before the end of the month. After the kiln was completed, they contrived to burn a considerable quantity of coarse ware; not very well shaped, I must confess, but the specimens I received, gave me so much satisfaction that for their encouragement, I made them a present of the kiln, and two tons of coals; part of our stock imported for burning lime.

On Saturday, the 22d of December, there was a grand field-day. We mustered seventy-two rank and file, including Sergeant Craig, the two corporals, the drillman and drummers; besides three artillery-men, who attended muster with one of the field-pieces. The new comers were well dressed and equipped, and having belonged to the militia at Jamaica, did not disgrace the squad. My brother acquitted himself well, as Captain of the band. Both great guns, and small arms, were exercised; the business finished with firing ball at a target.

On the following day, which was the Sabbath, I had the pleasure to see a full attendance at divine worship. The people were all remarkably clean and neatly dressed, every one wearing straw hats, the manufacture of the island. Many persons, black as well as white, joined in the hymns; and a joyous feeling seemed to be imparted to the whole congregation, by the discourse of our excellent pastor, who took his text from the second chapter of St. Matthew:—" Where is he that is born King of the Jews? for we have seen his star in the East, and are come to worship him." He represented the Saviour's coming, as the morning star, ushering in the light of day, before which the long night of darkness was dispelled, that for so many ages had hung upon the nations. The blessed Gospel, he said, was as the sea breeze, with healing on its wings, that comes in from the portals of the East, breathing life and comfort to all who feel its influence. He then dwelt on the holy precepts of our blessed Redeemer, and on the righteous example he had set before us; and desired us, if we would call him Lord, to adorn his Gospel by the sanctity of our lives. In concluding his most excellent discourse, he said,—“in a few days we shall have the happiness to commemorate the anniversary of the Messiah's coming, as foretold by the wise men who saw his star in the East, a day of rejoicing to all men; for in the end, his Gospel shall cover the earth as the waters cover the sea.”

The Tuesday following, was Christmas day. The dawn was awakened by the drum and fife playing, “The Reveillez.” Every thing had been provided for the Isthmean games, and a festival enjoyment prepared, for the people, and ourselves, as on the preceding year. It was delightful to me—to my dear Eliza it was the same—to be present at their sports; and to witness both men, women, and children, enjoying themselves with the various refreshments, and pastimes, that had been provided for their recreation and amusement. The St. George's flag, which has a white field with a red cross, was hoisted at sunrise, on a flag-staff lately erected at the fort; but as I now thought it necessary to husband our gunpowder, no salute was fired, as on the former anniversary of this blessed day.

All our friends banqueted with us at the mansion: we assembled in our best attire, and my dear wife wore the diamond cross which our much-lamented Queen had placed upon her breast. All our plate and best dinner equipage were displayed. Mistress Rota covered the table sumptuously with three courses in succession, followed by a dessert of delicious fruits, all the product of this late desolate island. Master Diego stood behind my chair, in state, dressed in his blue and gold, being more superbly attired, but equal in self-importance to King Cudjoe of the Maroons. His six bargemen, in white jackets and petticoat trowsers, with new Bandana handkerchiefs tied loosely in a bowling knot round their shirt collars, were also in attendance; besides my two habitual men-servants, Rowland Dick and Raymond Price (the mulatto drummers sent to me by Governor Trelawney), now dressed in the King's livery. Mistress Rota took post in the second hall, where she received the maid-servants in a train with the supplies from the kitchen, whence they were forwarded to the dinner-table in due order, without bustle or confusion.

I confess I felt proud, as I sat opposite to my beloved wife, in gazing on her, and on the cross she wore; and in the recollection of the love and friendship the royal bestower of it, had on all occasions manifested for her who wore it. I felt proud, also, in seeing myself surrounded by affectionate relations and kind friends; and in being so sumptuously served by the produce of our own settlement. In this latter consideration, my satisfaction was complete: it could not be increased, even by the wines of the finest quality, from Madeira, the Rhine, and the Garonne, that now associated themselves with our native dessert, nor by the brave appearance of my men in waiting.

After dinner, Rosalie came in with Mr. Rowley's children. She, as well as they, was desired to take a seat at the table. This matter had been talked over by my dear wife, not only with me, but with Mr. and Mrs. Rowley; and it had been determined that, considering her uniform good conduct, her excellent education, and respectable descent, she might be promoted to the rank of companion to Lady Seaward, with strict propriety, and treated as one of the family. Rosalie was modest, though frank and lively; she hesitated to take the chair offered to her.—“Mademoiselle Filibert,” said my dear Eliza, “I seize on the opportunity this day affords me, of seating you among my friends, and by the side of those dear children whom we love. Their father, and your father, and my father,—ministers of the same Lord, whose day we now celebrate,—presents a bond of union, I am not disposed to reject. I therefore desire you to be seated among us; and because I esteem you for your own sake, I wish henceforth to rank you among my friends, and to treat you as my companion, and as one of the family.”—Rosalie expressed her thanks, with much good feeling and courtesy, as she sat down; on which I drank her health, all our friends following my example. Then she sung, and played to us on her guitar; and the day was made to resound with decent joy, throughout the settlement.

On the 27th, we had the pleasure to receive intelligence from the look-out on the promontory, that the Porghee was in sight, but alone; and in the afternoon she made her way into the harbour, with baffling winds and squally weather; coming to an anchor on the starboard bow of the Spanish prize. I was rejoiced to see Drake again, for I had not been without some uneasiness for his timely return; knowing too well how to appreciate the dangerous tempests which visit these seas soon after the winter solstice, not to wish anxiously for his safe arrival before the weather became unsettled.

He brought me a letter from the Admiral, which was short, but quite satisfactory:—"Dear Sir,—All you wish shall be done:—thank you for the sheep. Yours, Edward Vernon."—"Laconic enough, Drake," said I, folding up the letter, after having cast my eye over its contents: "however, it says all I should desire; so I have no reason to complain.—The Admiral, we know, is a man of deeds, and not of words; I therefore excuse his apparent want of courtesy."—"I assure you, Sir Edward," replied Drake, "he was not so hard up for words in speech, as on paper: he said you were 'a fine fellow, dirtily used;' and he had great pleasure in serving you.—The manner in which he behaved, showed his sincerity: he ordered every facility to be given to the vessels to dispose of their cargoes; the greater part of which was sold before I came away, and for which hard dollars had been received by Van Kempen." Then turning to my brother, who stood by eager to hear more,—"Mr. Seaward," continued Drake, "I have a letter for you, from Mynheer Van Kempen, and a remittance on board on account of sales, up to the day of my departure, to the tune of 6000 dollars."

Drake then resumed his discourse to me. He had arrived at Porto Bello on the 8th; and he sailed thence again, in company with a squadron of men of war, on the 13th; and proceeded with the Admiral off Carthage, where, from his local knowledge, he was employed a few days to reconnoitre the Spanish force; but finally received orders, on the 24th, to make the best of his way to Seaward Islands, and thence go on to Jamaica with the prize. "Well, Captain Drake," said I, affecting an austere tone, "and what is your intention as to the time of your sailing for Jamaica?"—"To obey the Admiral's order promptly, Sir Edward," he replied: "I will sail to-morrow, if you have no objection."—"To-morrow, Drake!—are you mad? look at the weather," was my reply.—"The weather must not prevent me, Sir Edward; it ought not. The Admiral is at sea, and I dare not skulk in harbour." Answered my gallant friend.—"But you must stay for the christening," said Mr. Rowley; "we mean to christen your little girl on Sunday."—"My public duty is my first consideration, Mr. Rowley," replied Drake: "if it did not stand in the way, nothing could be so great a happiness to me as that you propose."—"Then, Captain Drake, for the good of his Majesty's service, the Governor of Seaward Islands will prevent you," said I, "from drowning yourself and crew, because you think it your duty to obey the Admiral's orders, in the face of an approaching tempest! Although the Admiral is now at sea, before many days are over his head, he will be of my mind, and wish himself, and every ship under his command, in any nook or harbour that would shelter them. Get your schooner into Peccary Creek; tow your prize in there also. Do it without loss of time; and you shall have my written order, for all I now command to be done."—"Sir, I obey," said Drake, gravely; then, taking a glass of wine, good-humouredly drank my health, and quitted the hall to put my orders into execution.

The bad weather did not come on so instantaneously as I expected, yet it continued to lower and threaten daily; being sometimes calm, sometimes blowing sharply all round the compass; which reminded my dear Eliza, and myself, of the coming of the dreadful tempest by which we were cast on these islands. The warning this season, was long and unremitted, so that we had plenty of time to secure all our boats and canoes; and to make such dispositions for the security of our buildings, and ourselves, as the experience of former years had taught us would be necessary.

On Tuesday, the 1st of January, it was calm during the greater part of the day. At sunset the clouds gathered and broke, sending forth awful shoots of forked lightning, closely followed by heavy peals of thunder, like the firing of the ships at Porto Bello on the Hierro fort. It then blew a tremendous gale, mostly from the westward. We were up at the mansion all night. The storm continued with little interruption for three days, blowing a hurricane, and pouring down sheets of water at intervals, like the cascade of a great river.

At Allwood's Bay, they were under the lee of the hills; and I was happy in reflecting that my dear sister was well sheltered from the violence of the wind at Spring Hill, and also that she had her husband safe at home with her. The vessels were safe in Peccary Creek; but the German settlement, and ourselves, were quite exposed; and nothing but the heavy rains could preserve Soldier's Town from being buried by the drift sand from the isthmus. The western face of the promontory neutralized the force of the wind at the village, which lay immediately beneath it; and with respect to the storehouses within the cavern stoccado, they were secure against the utmost efforts of the hurricane, unless a stroke of lightning should pass into the magazine, and blow the whole up together.

Early on Saturday morning our three look-outs were on the alert, one on the promontory, another at the flagstaff on the height above German Town, and the third on the summit of the Sugar-Loaf Hill on Edward's Island; where Drake had planted a flag-staff also, and up to which an indifferent cork-screw walk had been cut in my absence.—From this last post, a vessel was seen in distress to the north-west, evidently stranded. Although the weather continued still boisterous, and a heavy sea was rolling in upon the reefs to the westward, breaking furiously over them, Drake lost no time in manning my barge and his own boat, with some of his best men; and taking the Avon also with him, manned by the blacks (his former crew and present townsmen), attended by two canoes, which were paddled by Diego's men; he made the best of his way round the south headland of Edward's Island, keeping between the innermost range of breakers and the shore.

No small devastation had been committed on the island. At my own place, the plantation storehouse was blown down; Sergeant Craig's house nearly unroofed. Many shingles were blown off the mansion; and the whole of the poultry house, stoccadoes and all, were carried away, and blown up against the stone kitchen, and even back to the very face of the hill, by which some of the stock was killed. Much injury also had been done at German Town; so that the exertion of all hands not gone in the boats, was immediately called for, and no delay allowed in making the necessary arrangements for repairing the various sorts of damage sustained.

A little before noon one of the boats returned to say, that the vessel was a Kingston privateer; that all the people would be saved; and that the vessel was lying on a sand-bank within the reef, with her side beat in, where nothing but a most tremendous heave of the sea could have carried her. Four of the privateer's men, who had been hurt, were brought on shore in the boat, and placed immediately under the care of Dr. Gordon. Before night the whole of the crew, thirty-five men and the captain, were safely landed at the village, and every comfort afforded them that our present situation would admit.

In consultation with Mr. Rowley, I determined to borrow the Lord's day, and work, as our need was pressing; and to dedicate an early day, in lieu, to fasting and prayer, which we might hope in mercy would be accepted. This I made known at night to the people; and we proceeded on Sunday morning, at daylight, the day being fine, and the weather settled, to repair our most urgent damages. The Captain of the privateer, at the same time being supplied with boats, attended by Martin, Purdy, and the two New Englanders, was sent off to endeavour to save what stores he could from his vessel; with directions to land them on the northwest end of Edward's Island, and there make an encampment with spars and sails for their reception, and the accommodation of his men. I gave orders that provisions should be sent off daily from the village by boat, to a little bay within a hundred yards of the place intended for their encampment, but on the hither side, opposite German Town.

During the greater part of the week, every person in the settlement was actively employed one way or other, in repairing the injuries sustained from the hurricane, and in furnishing supplies for the privateer's crew. As I knew Drake must soon sail for Jamaica, I was under the necessity of engaging part of my time in writing official despatches to the Secretary of State, descriptive of my late unpleasant mission to Porto Bello. And I did not omit writing a private letter to Lord Harrington on the subject, who had always manifested a feeling towards me, separate from his official situation. Letters were also got ready by my dear wife, and my sister, for Awbury; and I wrote, besides, some to Jamaica, also one to my banker in London, and another to my uncle at Bristol.

On Friday we held a solemn fast; and on the following Sunday divine service was observed with due solemnity; after which, Mr. Rowley christened Drake's dear little girl "Eliza." The privateer's men remained at their work as usual; but I sent a message to the Captain, requesting him to come to prayers: this he treated with derision, only laughing at the messenger, by whom he sent back rather a profane, and therefore a rude answer.

Drake sailed with his prize on Tuesday, the 15th, and my brother accompanied him, taking with him the 6000 dollars that Van Kempen had sent from Porto Bello, and about 14,000 more, which he had lately amassed by commerce. Drake told me I must not expect his return under a month, for the schooner required new sheathing, and many other repairs. On his taking leave, I gave him a memorandum of some things required for our private use. Diego, who then stood by at the time, eagerly said,—“And 100 cats, Captain Drake.”—“Thank you, Master Diego,” I exclaimed, “I had forgot that most important commission. Bring us a good complement of rat killers, but not quite 100.”—“Not one too much, sir,” resumed Diego; “the rats very powerful, sir.”—“Very well,” replied Drake, “I'll see to it, Master Diego.”

The captain of the privateer would neither send any one to Jamaica in the Porghee, nor write by Captain Drake, nor give any clue to whom his vessel belonged; which induced us to suspect there was something wrong about him and his vessel; but I could not guess what. He himself was an Anglo-American, named Barnes; his crew, whites, mulattoes, and blacks; some of all nations; something like ourselves in that respect. The Porghee was not two days gone, before this fellow and his people began to manifest not only ungrateful, but insubordinate and rebellious conduct. Although they were well supplied with provisions every morning, a strong party of them went over to German Town, where they took away fowls, and behaved, moreover, with great indecency to some of the women. On hearing this, I sent Dr. Gordon to them, with a threat of stopping their supplies, if they did not conduct themselves properly. The threat appeared to have the desired effect, with regard to their manners on shore; but a few days after, having learnt that they had ceased to attempt the removal of anything more from the wreck, I sent a message to Martin, ordering him to return with the Avon and the other boats, but to leave one canoe. The captain, on being told this, absolutely refused to send his men round with the boats, or to suffer Martin and Purdy to get under sail with the Avon; but obliged them to return in the canoe, which I had despatched with my message, and which was intended to be left for the accommodation of the strangers. I was not a little astonished when Martin re-appeared without the boats, and described to me what had passed; but I was doubly astonished, when he said, "They take away the boat from German Town, sir,—privateer, no English privateer at all, sir, no more than buccaneer; rob, plunder, and kill every body."

This was a very unpleasant business. The villain had all our boats, excepting my barge, and two canoes; and I now had sufficient reasons for considering him an arrant pirate, and for believing that his intention might be to put to sea in the Avon, with his most valuable effects, and rob, and plunder the settlement for sea stock; and perhaps take all the other boats with him, for his better accommodation. I, however, dissembled my displeasure, which induced him to think we were afraid of him. Provisions were forwarded the next morning as usual, with a civil message, requesting the boats; to which he returned a surly answer, saying—"He was not done with them;" at the same time making a requisition of certain things to be sent the next day, in addition to the customary supply. When I received his message, I could scarcely suppress the anger I felt rising in my breast at his insolence and ingratitude; and from this moment I lost no time in making the best dispositions in my power to get our whole band together, so as to transport them to Allwood's Bay by ten o'clock that night, which was very quickly and quietly accomplished.

Sergeant Craig supplied every man's cartouche box with twelve rounds of ball cartridge; and, that we might not look quite like ragamuffins, he made the men dress. And this was the more necessary, as I learned from Martin that the fellows had saved both half-pikes and cutlasses from the wreck, and also fire-arms, though he believed no gunpowder.

By eleven o'clock our men were formed in double rank in front of Allwood's house. At the same time I despatched the barge round with Diego and his own crew, accompanied by Martin and Purdy, all well armed, with directions to seize the Avon and the other boats, or to prevent their escape, should any of the pirates be embarked in them. I gave the barge time to get round the headland, calculating she would afterwards keep way with us, and I then marched with the whole body, about sixty men, through the narrow pass below Spring Hill. In an hour we arrived at the further end of Long Bay, where we halted, and fixed bayonets; and in ten minutes more I surrounded the canvass sheds of the pirates, by five divisions, of twelve men each. I immediately detached one party, to the western beach, under Sergeant Craig; my object there being to possess myself of the Avon, and the other boats. In an instant the fellows were on the alert, but evidently in great consternation; the Captain hallooing out "Cutlasses!" On which I said, in a loud voice, "That every man of his should instantly be shot, who appeared with a pike or cutlass." I spoke loud enough to be heard by the whole party. But some of his fellows made an instant rush, with cutlasses in their hands, towards the beach. These desperadoes were immediately fired on by our men nearest to them, who had given way to let them pass. On which, or in a few minutes after, they were attacked by Sergeant Craig's party, and by Diego and his crew, who had just landed; to whom they instantly surrendered. But the Captain still was not disposed to yield, although some of his men had already fallen. I was therefore obliged to order the people to charge the villains. Young Allwood was cut down at the onset, and another man of ours also: but our bold fellows pushed forward on them, like brave soldiers, at once overpowering them. But even then we found much difficulty in completely subduing and securing them, they being desperate ruffians, and their Captain fighting like a badger in a corner of the rock. As fast, however, as we could do it, they were tied, two and two together, with their own ropes; and I took special care to have the Captain pinioned, and otherwise well bound, and placed alone. The whole crew, except two killed and five wounded, were now made to sit together on the sand for the present, with a guard round them. Diego's barge party, which had landed just after the volley was fired, having done their parts, were now sent back to the boats with some additional hands; to get the craft round by the north end of the island, as quickly as possible.

My thoughts soon turned on those left at home; and in consequence I despatched two messengers, to make all speed by the way we came, to inform Mrs. Drake and the women at Allwood's Bay that the pirates were secured; and thence to proceed over to the mansion by a canoe, with the like intelligence to Lady Seaward: then go forward to Peccary Field, and send on some of the negro women to German Town, and to the Doctor's house, and to Soldiers' Town, with the news. For I felt that my own dear wife, and every other man's dear wife, besides our kind-hearted minister, might not be without great anxiety on the occasion; although no one could have expected that fellows almost unarmed, would have offered resistance to a body of well-appointed men, double their numbers.

Doctor Gordon took charge of the wounded men on the field; and at dawn of day, the two men killed were buried where they fell. The Avon and the other boats arrived from the opposite side of the island, soon after morning broke: and as it was my intention to put all the secured prisoners into this large boat, and tow her over to the black rock below the village, I thought it right first to examine their pockets; to take away knives, or any other destructive instrument, they might have about them. In doing this, I discovered a little bag in the Captain's pocket, which contained emeralds of some value; likewise some Portuguese Johannas, and moidores, in his purse. The men, also, were despoiled of some gold, a good deal of silver, and a few knives: and although it was a tedious process, I noted down with my pencil every man's name, and what had been taken from him.

The Captain remained perfectly sullen: he was an ugly black-whiskered fellow, looking like a wild boar tied for the slaughter. But some of the men were conciliatory, saying a good deal; enough to let us know there were plenty of pieces of eight, and some smaller money, in bags under the canvass sheds. My first object, after the arrival of the boats, was to despatch the barge with the Doctor and wounded men, to be lodged with their comrades, the four hurt in the shipwreck. Young Allwood, and the other wounded man of ours, who was a negro of my brother's household, were sent to their respective homes, their wounds not being dangerous; and there were also some slight hurts on both sides, of still less consequence, not worth mentioning. The barge being gone with the wounded, I was in no hurry to send the other fellows off; but made them remain on the strand, until I wrote an inventory of every thing taken, in their presence. There was not any article of value, besides the coin; of which there were 9000 pieces of eight, in bags, and four bags of piastres, amounting to 4300 pieces of eight more. There were thirty-six cutlasses, as many half pikes, twenty old muskets, five hangers, one of which was very handsome, a parcel of damaged sails and spars, some bales of silk, and other things. It came out, before we had done, that it had been their intention to have built a small vessel out of the remains of the wreck; with which they intended to depart; but as the Captain thought the Avon might do just as well, he said it would save a great deal of time and trouble, if they would seize her: and they confessed that they did intend to put his plan into immediate execution: but where he was to sail with her, they did not know, or would not tell.

By nine o'clock, Diego returned with the barge. The good old man had made a point of seeing Lady Seaward, to assure her that I was well, and that I would soon appear with the prisoners. All the bullion and arms were put into his boat, and the prisoners into the Avon.

The other boats took the Avon in tow. The non-commissioned officers, and the three artillery-men, were the only persons reserved for a guard. The other people were sent off to their respective habitations. Indeed, I was anxious to despatch them to their homes; for this was the season for getting in the crops, and they had been much hindered by various incidental circumstances.

My dear wife, with Mr. and Mrs. Rowley, and Rosalie, with kind-hearted Mistress Rota, were all upon the beach to greet me on my landing. My beloved Eliza caught my hand, as I stepped from the boat. "Welcome, my Edward," she said; "is all well?"—"All is well, my love," I replied; "by the mercy of God, we have been rescued from the perfidy of those villians."—"You look pale and fatigued, Sir Edward," said Mr. Rowley; "come up, and take breakfast, which is ready waiting for you." He would have given me his arm, but that my dear Eliza would not concede to any human being: so, ordering Diego and his men to bring up the bullion and the arms, I leaned on one who was born to lean on me; and we walked up quietly together, followed by our friends. On entering the hall, when I took off my hat my dear wife perceived my hair matted with blood. "You are wounded, Edward," she exclaimed; "do you know it?"—"No, love," I replied, I am not wounded; why do you think so?" She then put my hand on my head, where I found sure enough that I had received a slight cut; but on taking away the hair, it was seen to be of no importance.

At breakfast, I detailed to our friends all that had occurred. To many, such a recital would have occasioned no emotions but such as might arise from sentiments of indignation, at the ungrateful perfidy of the pirate and his crew: but Mr. Rowley lamented over their lost condition, as sinful men; and my tender Eliza dropped a tear, when I said, "Two of them were killed, and buried on the spot where they fell."

After breakfast, I took Mr. Rowley with me to the village, to visit the wounded men. We found Doctor Gordon with them. He had placed them comfortably on mattresses, and had dressed their wounds; and he now requested of me two persons to attend on them; which I immediately granted; and gave orders for every thing he might want, to be supplied from the mansion, for their convenience. We now walked to the plank-house; before which all the prisoners were standing. I desired Sergeant Craig to unpinion the Captain, but to keep his legs fettered, and then confine him in the plank-house; where a sentry must always be kept over him. All the other fellows, who amounted to twenty-four, were marched within the cave storehouse stoccado. I told them, I knew they were pirates, without letter of marque or commission; and that as such, every one of them was liable to be hung; but now was the time for any who chose to save themselves, to come forward and depose to the facts of their Captain's conduct; and that within an hour I would send to see who were disposed to speak the truth. This was declared in English, in French, in Spanish, and in Dutch, by different persons I had provided for that purpose. Mr. Rowley and myself now returned home, leaving an artillery sentinel at the gate.

Within the hour, two men came forward, and were brought to the mansion. They were Englishmen, and Cornishmen from Mivigissey. They stated, that they had entered with the pirate, to save their lives; that the vessel they first belonged to, had been plundered and burned by the pirate; and all the rest of the crew, with their Captain, been made to walk the plank. They detailed enormities I will not repeat: but stated, that the pirate had a rendezvous, where another like himself resorted to, on a small island near the Mosquito shore. I took the depositions of these men, before Mr. Rowley; and then placed them again in confinement, but separate from the others, in a house of the village. I desired two more witnesses of a different nation, which I soon found in a Frenchman and a Spaniard, who, on being examined, substantiated what the Englishmen had said; adding some other circumstances, that had happened prior to their capture. I took depositions from these men also; and this was enough. I then sent them to the same place where I had lodged the Englishmen.

I was determined not to allow the great body of villains to eat the bread of idleness; and as our people had been much interrupted by them, in the field labour, now so pressing, I ordered the twenty that were confined within the stoccado, to be divided among the settlers, and set to work to-morrow morning, tied by the leg, two and two: Diego being instructed to employ the four King's evidences on our own grounds, at the silk-cotton-tree plantation.

Early the next morning twenty cutlasses were distributed among the most discreet men of our different settlements, and the pirates divided among them. But before they were marched off from the stoccado, they were given to understand, that if any of them attempted to run away from their work, or from the place they were sent to, they should be shot. Indeed, all this precaution seemed necessary; for rope-chains were but packthread fastenings to such daring renegadoes. I, however, ventured to trust to the precautions I had taken with respect to the men; but the smith was ordered to make substantial irons, for the legs of the pirate Captain, at which he worked night and day till they were finished. And I was glad when they were put on; for this ruffian breathed nothing but vengeance and defiance. I, however, kept him on biscuit and water, and obliged him to pick oakum for his pastime and maintenance.

The Avon had been much injured during her late employment, it was therefore necessary that she should be repaired; and as I could well spare Derrick, my bondman and ship-carpenter, the boat was hauled up, and he and his apprentice set to work to put her in thorough order. I was the more disposed to do this at the present time, as by taking part of a plank out of her bottom, until every thing else but the calking and painting were done, I should be relieved of apprehension as to the pirates putting into effect any conspiracy they might form to carry her off, and make their escape.

The agricultural operations now went on apace; every one being employed, and the additional piratical hands giving great assistance. The wounded men were gradually recovering, and every thing proceeded orderly and well. There was, however, no muster-day on the following Saturday. But we observed the Sabbath as usual, and brought the delinquents up to the hallowed spot, as possibly some good might come of it. On the following Saturday, the 2d of February, the labours of the field being nearly finished, I felt myself at liberty to resume our military muster; the pirates now being within the cave stoccado, before which we paraded.

When our men were drawn up, I addressed them on the subject of the late encounter on Edward's Island. I told them that the persons we had made prisoners were pirates,—miscreants that plundered all nations; who, not having the fear of God before their eyes, ran forward in a career of wickedness, carrying death and destruction in its path, to every one they could overcome; but now ending, as all wickedness does end, in their own destruction. "But," added I, turning round to the piratical crew; who stood close up to the bars of the stoccado, "evil as has been your conduct to us, it shall be my endeavour to save your lives; and I hope the law will be satisfied with taking that of your Captain only. Turn, therefore, to the God of Mercy, who has put this lenity into my heart, but whom you have long forgotten, or perhaps never knew, and pray to him that he may influence the minds of men in power to desire to save you, as I do." Then again addressing our own people, I said—"My brave fellows! you are all entitled to my best thanks, for you all did your duty cheerfully and unostentatiously. Considerable booty, in silver, has been taken; and I shall lose no time in petitioning the King of England to allow me to divide it among you, in such proportions as he may direct." I then left them to go through their evolutions; which they commenced by giving me three hearty cheers.

In the evening, when Sergeant Craig came to me for orders, he told me that Barnes, the Pirate Captain, said, he did not think, when the King's schooner sailed, there were above seven men-at-arms left on the island;—that he was thunderstruck, when he and his party were surrounded by soldiers,—he could scarcely believe his eyes, and for a few minutes thought he must be dreaming;—that if he had known how it was, he would have put our pipe out the night before,—he would have given the Governor promotion! "The rascal had the hardihood to tell you this, Craig?" said I.—"Yes, sir," he replied; "and seemed to have no other regret, than his not having done it."

On the next day, which was the Sabbath, our good minister preached expressly to the deluded men; but I did not admit their Captain. He was kept in close confinement at the plank-house, with a sentry over him. However, in the course of the week, Mr. Rowley desired permission to visit him in his clerical capacity; which I readily granted

On Monday morning, I turned out the pirate crew in a body, and told them, that their fate, perhaps, depended on their orderly behaviour: that I was about to try them, by sending them altogether to complete a road on the opposite island. They promised fairly; and as soon as arrangements were made, I sent the whole gang, excepting the King's evidences, and the wounded men, to Allwood's Bay; placing over them as a guard the three artillerymen, with orders to see them finish the spiral road. It was to be made five feet in width, up to the summit of the Sugar-Loaf Hill, agreeably to the plan Drake had once explained to me; and which he had attempted to begin, by cutting a kind of footpath in the direction he meant the road to be formed.

The hurry of our agricultural operations being over, I ordered a canvass shed to be erected at the foot of the hill for the pirates, well stoccadoed round; and for greater security, fire-arms were deposited with the settlers at the bay. All this was necessary; for the work to be done, required that the fellows should have pickaxes, and shovels, and spades,—arms of no despicable quality in such hands. But they went on during the week, and afterwards, quietly and orderly, in their labour.

CHAPTER XI.

ON the 26th of February, Van Kempen returned with the galliot and schooner from Porto Bello. His expedition had been successful beyond expectation. He had brought the merchandize to a market at his own price, and had purchased the cargo of a prize for a mere song, because she was not seaworthy to send to Jamaica. On Wednesday the 5th of March, Drake made his appearance, and came to anchor in the afternoon. He brought a schooner with him under convoy, which my brother had chartered at Kingston, to take in goods purposely for the Spanish market. But the Mary, my uncle's brig, also came in with him; that vessel having arrived at Jamaica while he was there. We were all glad to see Taylor's vessel in company with the Porghee. I expected some commissions by him of no ordinary kind; besides, we all were looking anxiously for letters from England. Drake brought an officer of engineers with him. This officer had been sent from England to join Admiral Vernon, but arrived too late by a few days, the Admiral having sailed from Jamaica on the 25th of February; to which place he had gone, after the great January storm, by which he had suffered severely. The Porghee, too, had been obliged to wait for repair, until all the large ships received their outfit; so that she had not been able to sail for Seaward Islands, before the first of the present month.

I greeted my brave fellow with a hearty welcome on his landing, for I was heartily glad to see him again; but being impatient to greet his Maria, he hastily introduced Captain Frazer to me, and then was about to make his escape to the other side of the water. "I must see my Maria," said he; "but will come again before sunset." —"Not so fast, my dear friend," I exclaimed; "I cannot allow you to go to Spring Hill, without first telling you that it is occupied by pirates." Drake stared at me; and then smiled rather questionably, directing an inquiring eye to Mr. and Mrs. Rowley. "True enough," answered the reverend gentleman. Drake now rested his somewhat agitated look on my dear Eliza. "This mystery is not well!" she said: "go, Captain Drake; perhaps your dear wife, with her baby, is anxiously expecting you. It is true, there are pirates at Spring Hill; but they are prisoners."—"But what am I to make of this, Sir Edward?" exclaimed Drake.—"The fact is," returned I, "we have been under the necessity of seizing those fellows you saved from the wreck. I have discovered them to be pirates; and there are now twenty of them, under a guard, employed in making the corkscrew road you projected, from the base to the summit of Sugar-Loaf Hill."—"I should like to see it," exclaimed the engineer. "We shall have the pleasure of showing it to you to-morrow, Captain Frazer," I replied. "Now, my dear Drake," continued I, "speed home, and do not let me see your face here again to-night; but to-morrow, as early as you please. There are many questions I wish to ask you, and some things I desire to tell you. Now be off; Captain Frazer shall be my guest the while." Drake did not wait another bidding; but was making his escape in right earnest, when Master Diego, like a black genius, seized on the unlucky wight, exclaiming—" Los Gatos, Capitan nobile!"—"What the devil do you want, Diego?" replied Drake, hastening away, with my zealous major domo at his heels.—"The cats, Captain Drake!" vociferated he.—"O, there are two sacks full of them," rejoined Drake.—"Your pardon, Capitan nobile," replied Diego, making a dead stand, and bowing profoundly; "I ask pardon for great bad manners, sir." Drake was the best tempered fellow in the world; so, turning round, he took off his hat, and having returned Master Diego's low bow, made a precipitate retreat to the boat, and rowed off, with all expedition, for his château.

After coffee, Captain Frazer, and myself walked out to shew the lions of the place. I was desirous to take him to the great silk-cotton tree, and some other things; But he directed himself immediately to the battery. I therefore bent my course with him at once from the mansion, to that point. He surveyed it for some time without making any observations, then asked me what other batteries I had on the Island. I told him, we had only one gun on the height above us. He said he would like to go up and see it. I wished him to have a mule, but he preferred climbing the ascent on foot; and as I now thought myself quite strong enough; and as the cool of the evening was approaching, I offered to accompany him on foot also. Sergeant Craig was in attendance; so we ascended the promontory all together. From the flag-staff, Captain Frazer had a bird's-eye view of the islands, their channels, and harbour. He asked many questions respecting all these points; on which I was able to satisfy him tolerably well. We then returned to the mansion, the stars appearing as we descended the hill. Captain Taylor of the Mary, was waiting to see me; I therefore turned our military guest over to the ladies, and went apart with Taylor, to talk over matters of a different interest to that which had just occupied my attention.

Next morning I laid the chart of the islands before

Captain Frazer, by his desire. He entered on the subject of our defensive arrangement, as Drake came in; and he soon made it clear to me, that the ten guns were placed in a worse than useless position. He said, where they now were, they could make no defence against the entrance of ships; and that the battery was too weak to do anything, after a force had got in: in fact, it would only serve to draw a destructive fire upon my own residence. He thought the rock below the conical hill, was the best place for a battery; there, the southern passage was open to its fire, and by such a situation it would command the harbour in every direction. "And," continued he, "if you were to place a large gun, with a depressing carriage, on the summit of the hill above the rock, (which you can do easily, as you are making a spiral road to the top of it,) that gun would command the fort below. So that even if the fort were taken, you could beat the enemy out of it again in a trice."—"You are right, sir," said I, "and your ideas shall be put into immediate execution."—"Well," he replied, "we will visit the opposite side, and I shall then be able to speak more positively on the subject."

After breakfast, we went to Allwood's Bay, and reconnoitered the rock opposite the great conical hill. Here Captain Frazer now expressed himself as being quite certain of the eligibility of the plan he had suggested. We then inspected the working gang, under the artillery guard; who, by this time, had got half way to the hill's summit, and therefore had made more than two-thirds of the road. Many large trees had been felled during this operation; and, now stripped of their branches, they lay for timber on the grounds below. Drake was delighted with what had been done, and by the plan in contemplation.

When we had winded up the spiral road, until it brought us immediately opposite to the black rock, on which the new fort was to be constructed, Captain Frazer suddenly stood still, and said—"We will throw a draw-bridge over the narrow pass, from this point, to our intended fort. I think we stand twenty-four feet above the pass. This must be the only entrance to the fort. Such a position will add much to its security." I was much pleased with the idea; and admired the sagacity, which, in a moment, saw its application to the situation of our proposed new battery. On our return down the hill, I spoke some encouraging things to the miserable men; whom I sent for from their work above, to hear what I had to say to them. I expressed to them my satisfaction in what they had done; and said, I had little doubt but that the happiest consequences would result from a steady perseverance in their present orderly and industrious conduct.

After paying our respects to Mrs. Drake, we proceeded in my barge to reconnoitre the positions at the northern entrance of the harbour. After some time, Captain Frazer fixed on the steep rocky eminence situated towards the N. E. point of Edward's Island, for two guns; which would at once command the northern channel, cover Peccary Field Bay, and co-operate with the fort, to be built opposite Spring Hill, in scouring the whole harbour; which would also be within long range of a forty-two pounder, if one could be got, and placed on the summit of that conical hill; by which, this second new fort, as well as the other, would be untenable by an enemy. "And," said he, "fifty men ought to defend that conical hill, against a thousand. Nothing but mortars can touch the position."

Having completed the object of our survey, and being near the spot where the pirates' vacant encampment yet stood, I could not resist the desire I had to show it to Captain Frazer, and to Drake. When on the ground, I told them the story of the conspiracy, and fought the battle over again. "The scoundrels!" exclaimed Frazer.—"Ah, but brave fellows, Sir Edward!" cried Drake; "fine fellows, in a good cause! See how they laid about them with their cutlasses! if the King of Spain's guards had been opposed to them, it would have been the same."—"That's all very fine," observed Captain Frazer, "but their cause was a bad one, and that is the present question; and if they get their deserts, every man of them must be hanged."—"I own that; but I have promised to save them all, if I can," said I, "except the captain. And it is my intention to send him, by and by, in the Porghee, to Jamaica to be tried. Four of his crew have impeached him with plundering vessels of different nations, and forcing their captains, passengers, and crews to walk the plank."—"Walk the plank!" inquired Captain Frazer; "what is that?"—"It is," I replied, "nothing more nor less than forcing them to walk overboard into the sea."

Having finished our conversation, we took a peep at the wreck with the glass. "I would advise you, Sir Edward," said Drake, "to order all the things saved from the wreck, to be sold in lots, and the hull of the vessel also, and let it be done by vendue; by which you will close your responsible account to whomsoever the things may belong, if they don't fetch five dollars." I thanked Drake for this piece of sound counsel; and as I was aware that the Porghee must proceed forthwith to Porto Bello, I made it my first business, on returning home, to order proclamation to be made, fixing the very next morning for the public sale; that it might not take place after Drake's departure. For if it did, it might opportunity to the pirates, to take advantage of the absence of the people from their homes.

After dinner, Captain Frazer was so kind as to draw out plans for the two forts he had suggested ; and made the model of a depressing carriage, for the large gun, to be mounted on the summit of the Sugar-Loaf Hill: which sort of gun, he said, he had no doubt could be easily obtained at Porto Bello ; as most likely it was in contemplation to demolish the fortifications of that place entirely.

On the following day many of the people attended the auction ; but my brother and Van Kempen were too much pressed for time, to go, having matters of much greater importance to attend to. The clerk of the Porghee was appointed vendue master, and got his percentage on the sale accordingly. The hull and spars were bought by Allwood and his son Manus. The torn sails, the cordage, some boxes of damaged cochineal, a few bales of soiled silk, and some other articles, valuable before they had been drenched by the sea, together with some smaller things of little note, were purchased chiefly by the people of the village, and others. The whole only netting 432 dollars.

By Saturday the 8th, the shipping arrangements were completed. I had advised Captain Taylor to go to Porto Bello with the Mary, and sell on my uncle's account, instead of disposing of any part of his cargo here: and much to Van Kempen's credit, he strongly urged the same ; although, he owned, it was against his own immediate interest to do so. But Taylor demurred ; saying, "Mr. William Seaward was a strict and straightforward man ; and so particular, in not allowing any deviation from his orders, that he could not venture to do as we suggested." He therefore sold to Van Kempen and my brother, whatever they pleased to select, at the prices affixed by my uncle to the invoice; taking bills on England for the amount. The galliot was loaded with the goods purchased from the Mary, and the chartered schooner was full of the merchandise brought in her from Kingston. With these vessels, Van Kempen sailed under convoy of the Porghee, for Porto Bello; and the Mary went out at the same time for Honduras, to take advantage of the escort for a short distance. I wrote a letter to Admiral Vernon, by Captain Drake, requesting two forty-eight, and fourteen eighteen-pound guns, with fifty or a hundred rounds of shot for each. And I desired Drake to procure for me two or three competent stone-masons, if possible; offering them good wages, and a safe return, should they desire to go back. On receiving my letter, and last instructions, he and Captain Frazer took their leave; my best thanks being returned to the engineer, for his very valuable services in pointing out to me the proper way of defending our harbour.

We had no military muster to-day, but Diego mustered his cats, whose rank and file fell short of a hundred by fourscore and ten; however, he was rejoiced to see even the few that had been brought. And having spoken to Van Kempen on the subject, he hoped in time to be master of an ample supply. But indeed we had all reason to be glad of the present importation, if it were only to keep the rats out of the dwelling-houses; which they had already begun to infest, as well as the store-houses, although not in great numbers.

In a few days the Tom Cod sailed for Jamaica, with her loading of the merchandise brought from Porto Bello, but my brother remained with us. After the departure of all the vessels, I looked closely into every thing at the settlement, seeing that every one was industriously occupied in their calling, even to the children. I visited every place, and saw that the damage done by the hurricane had been repaired, as far as the power of man could do it. I had my own stoccadoed pen, with the fowls' house, and other buildings for the stock, re-built substantially in two separate enclosures, behind the houses of Diego and Derrick; leaving the ground at the back of the mansion clear and open. By this alteration we were relieved from much inharmonious noise, and other nuisances. And in a little time I caused the central point of the open space to be occupied by a beautiful little jet d'eau, conveyed through a small leaden pipe from the spring above the silk-cotton tree, and made to play into a stone basin, which had been brought out to me in my uncle's brig. This jet d'eau was a delightful object, when looked at from the dining hall through the great door to the east; especially when the sun rose high enough above the promontory, to shine upon it; a rainbow was then seen in the air, quite close to it. And now that the pen and poultry houses were removed, the finely-wooded hill, appeared through the shining spray.

On the 26th, Drake came back from Porto Bello, well laden; and had left Van Kempen behind, with the two merchant vessels. The Porghee had arrived there with her convoy, on the very day the Admiral returned from bombarding Carthagená, and Drake lost no time in waiting on him with my letter, and to introduce Captain Frazer. "I am glad to see you, sir," said the Admiral to Drake. "But what are you sent here to do?" was his salutation to the Captain of Engineers, who bowed, and presented his letters. The Admiral went aside, until he had read them, and mine; then returning, said—"Mr. Drake, you may take away as many iron guns, and as much shot, from the batteries of Porto Bello, as you please.

Captain Fraser, I have no doubt you are a very clever fellow in your way ; but the Captain of the Diamond is also a very clever fellow, a capital engineer, both ashore and afloat ; so, if you please, you may take the command of Gloria Castle, or any other fort, or place here ; but I will not embark you in my ship."

Drake, having got a carte blanche for iron cannon, and shot, helped himself in the course of the week to sixteen large guns ; two of which were calibred for shot of forty-six pounds' weight ; the others for just half that weight of metal. These sized guns are awkward for an English fortress, there not being any English shot that will fit them ; but Drake had taken pretty good care to provide against that circumstance ; for he not only brought away their carriages complete, rammers and all, but also above fifty tons of shot, and several bales of unfilled paper and woollen cartridges. He helped himself also to some iron crow-bars, and a few wimple-jennies, that were of great service. He was also fortunate enough to succeed in procuring four regular stone-masons, natives of Old Spain, at three dollars per week each ; their provisions and safe return being also promised.

The Admiral sent for Drake after some days ; it was on the 21st. He then talked to him about the prize, saying there should be 5*l.* a man, head-money. He was, however, so well pleased when he heard that his share was at least 10,000 dollars upon the cargo, that he said—"What can I do to serve you, Mr. Drake?"—"If you will send Sir Edward Seaward some gunpowder with the cannon," replied Drake, "I know it will be acceptable. And although it is for the public service, nothing could gratify him or myself, more."—"Sit down, sir," said the Admiral. He then wrote an order for forty barrels of Spanish gunpowder ; which he gave to Drake, with a letter for myself; ordering him to be ready to put to sea with the squadron on the morrow. Drake took in the gunpowder for me, and a few cats for Diego; and sailed with the Admiral in the morning: but when out of port, was ordered to proceed direct for Seaward Islands; the squadron at the same time shaping its course for Punta Toro, to make an attack on the Castle of Chargre, at the embouchure of that river. The Admiral's letter to me was in the usual style, short and pithy: "I have sent you some Spanish guns; and, at Mr. Drake's request, something to cram them with. He says you have taken some pirates; send them to me, as they are men at arms, I will find work for them. Yours, E. V.—P.S. I'll send you some sick, and a vessel to repair now and then; Mr. Drake says you have brave means and good will. Some day or other I may take a look at you. E. V."

When I had read this letter, which was after Drake had finished his recital of what had occurred, I said—"Your zeal is great, my dear friend; thank you for what you have accomplished. Bring the masons on shore, and let them be comfortably lodged in the village for the present. But I fear we shall disappoint the Admiral's expectations, as to refitting any of his vessels as he would wish, or in giving a competent asylum to his sick; we will, however, do our best. Now speed you to the other side, and bring your wife over to dinner. We will then make some arrangements for future operations." I walked with him down to the beach, and on our way we met Master Diego, who had been on the look out for the needful. His boat's crew were at his heels, every one with a fine cat under his arm; Diego carrying a monstrous beast, as black as himself. "Thank you, Captain Drake," he said; "will shake rats now, sir, out of their skins."

My dear sister came over with her husband to dinner, as I had desired; after which, he and I made arrangements over a cigar, for putting Captain Frazer's plan into immediate effect. In discussing the business, we found the cigars very handy in helping us through some of the intricacies of our subject. By arranging a given number of them on the table, the sides and angles of the fort to be built at Spring Hill, were delineated agreeable to Captain Frazer's plan: a couple of them, placed parallel to each other, separated about an inch, represented the drawbridge; and a dozen of the ends of those that had been smoked, served to represent the guns when mounted. Thus, by help of the cigars, having the advantage of both fire and smoke, to assist our contemplations in the formation of the battery, we at length concluded on all that was to be done; our dear friends the while looking on and listening to us, not a little amused by the tobacco fortification.

On the following morning, I went over to Allwood's Bay; and being joined by Drake, it delighted me to witness the complete manner in which the spiral road to the summit of the Sugar-Loaf Hill had been finished: but it was necessary to make a platform on the top. This we now marked out, twenty-four feet in diameter; informing the artillery-men, that a forty-six pound gun was to be mounted on it. With this piece of intelligence they were highly delighted. The four Spanish masons now came over from the village, and were lodged with honest Xavier. I met them at the house where they were, and laid Captain Frazer's plan before them on the table. One of these men was remarkably intelligent; and I was also happy in finding a competent interpreter, in my old negro friend Xavier. I told the masons they should have twelve labourers, who must quarry the stone on the spot, or near it: and that the work must be set about without loss of time; and that I would take care to provide plenty of lime, before they could want it. Twelve of the pirate labourers, attended by two of the artillerymen, were then appointed to work at the fort; leaving one with the remaining fellows, to complete the platform.

The next day the Porghee discharged her powder, which was conveyed to the magazine. She then went over to Spring Hill rock, where she put on shore one forty-six pound gun, with twelve of the others, and a large portion of the shot; returning in the evening to her anchorage. On the morning after, a forty-six pound gun, with a proportion of shot, were landed upon the rocks below Fort George, by hauling alongside: and the same day she disembarked the other two guns, and the remainder of the shot, on the rock where the other battery was to be built.

While Drake was thus employed, I wrote my letters to the Governor of Jamaica, in which I enclosed the depositions regarding the pirates; and on the 29th the Porghee sailed for Kingston, with the pirate Captain, Bartholemey Barnes, and the four men of his crew that impeached him. Before Drake took his leave, I gave him an abstract from the list I had made of the things taken from the pockets of the pirate's crew, the morning they were seized. This abstract related to the four men he was about to convey to Jamaica, as witnesses; and with it I gave him their things also, directing him to restore them if the men should be liberated. I told the Governor in my letter, that Admiral Vernon would find use for the pirate's crew; and, indeed, it might be just as well to suffer them to be killed by the Spaniards, as to take the trouble of trying them, and hanging them ourselves. In my opinion, an example, was all that should be desired; and the proper one would be the Captain, Bartholemy Barnes.

Drake returned to us again on the 14th of April; after having delivered the culprit into the hands of justice, and witnessed the termination of the affair. Barnes was tried, condemned, and hung in chains on Port Royal Point. The four King's evidences were sent on board men-of-war, on which their money and knives were restored to them by Captain Drake. But there was a strong sensation at Jamaica, against the rest of the crew that remained with me; of which latter circumstance, the people there were ignorant; and nothing saved the men, but an idea of their being already sent to the Spanish Main, and in actual offensive operations against the enemy. This business, therefore, was well settled.

Drake brought me letters from England truly afflicting. My dear and worthy Mr. Goldsmith wrote to me a most distressing account of the condition of the peasantry about him; indeed, of the whole country. The frost had been so severe from Christmas-day, to the time at which he wrote, that all the wheats had been destroyed in the ground; and he said, if it were to continue much longer, a famine must be the consequence. The Severn was frozen for many miles beyond Bristol harbour; and he had heard that a fair was holding on the Thames. The village elm had been riven by the frost to its very root; and the main trunk of the great oak at Shellard's Lane had been split, if not destroyed. But it was the probable suffering of the poor people, that engaged his attention, and called for his commiseration and ours. My dear wife took this subject under her peculiar protection; making it, indeed, the daily and almost hourly topic of conversation. The result was, that I wrote to our friend and father, authorising him to remit half the year's rent to my tenants, and to distribute 100*l.* among the poor of Awbury and Hartfield (in addition to the money already allowed), in such sums and at such times as he might see necessary. To this I most sincerely added our regrets, that it was not in our power to send them a supply of flour and other provisions. However, I suggested to Drake and my brother, the idea of ordering a cargo from Virginia for Bristol; but the war, and other difficulties, soon obliged me to give up the scheme.

Meanwhile Van Kempen had arrived with his vessels; which were sent off direct with their cargoes to Jamaica, consigned to Mr. Green. But the Tom Cod did not return to Seaward Islands with Drake; that vessel having gone to Virginia, under a homeward-bound convoy through the Gulf, to carry flour and biscuit to Porto Bello, at Van Kempen's suggestion;—the English ships there, being much in want of those articles: indeed, all their provision was bad, both beef and biscuit. I wished she could have taken her cargo to England.

For very many months, there was not a foreign arrival in our harbour; which I attributed to the war with Spain. But on the 23d, a French brig made its appearance off, and was piloted in. She was bound to the Spanish Main, but had struck on a reef of rocks somewhere to the south-west of us; and being very leaky, was glad to get shelter any where. I received the Captain with great civility, telling him his vessel should be repaired. Preparations were accordingly made, the cargo landed, and the vessel hove down. However, in the meantime, Van Kempen and my brother bought all the cargo; and sold him cacao, and other South-American produce, cheaper than he could buy it on the Main. In a fortnight, he put again to sea; having made a better voyage, he said, than if no accident had happened to him; and our merchants, and honest fiscal, had also good reason to be satisfied with the reef that sent him to our port, for they also had made a good thing of it.

Drake had been employed, since his last arrival, in getting one of the largest guns up to the flag-staff on the promontory; whence he then moved the twelve-pounder already there, to the face of the precipice, that overlooks the isthmus. And he now set the millwright, smith, and Derrick, to work, to make a depressing carriage on Captain Frazer's plan, for the large gun now at the flag-staff on the promontory; and also one for the other large gun, to be mounted on the summit of Sugar-Loaf Hill. He was indefatigable at Spring Hill, while the platform was finishing; and also in forwarding the building of the fort, which went on with great spirit. On the 1st of May, he got the other large gun up to the platform, and on the succeeding day carried up the shot, and fixed the gun for service. A new flag-staff was erected in the centre of the platform, and a tent pitched round it, the flag-staff serving for the pole. A parapet-wall, of three feet in height, had been built round the platform, upon the circular edge of the steep summit; and a strong gate, placed seven feet high, with a small tower on each side of it. As the piece of ordnance stationed here, was to be lord and master over all the rest, three gates, similar to the one on the summit, were planted for additional security to the post, in the course of the spiral road: while the cutting away of the rock, rendered it difficult, if not impossible, to ascend the hill on either side of them.

By the middle of May, I felt that I could dispense with the labour of some of the pirates, although a busy time of the year: indeed, I was glad to do so; for many of them had become unruly, and, strange to say, more especially those who had been wounded. I therefore picked out ten of the best behaved, to retain with us, and sent off all the others to Porto Bello, giving to each man the money that had been taken from him. The Admiral was not in port when the Porghee arrived, but the gang of pirates sent, was delivered over with my letter to the senior officer.

Drake had the good fortune, on his return, to fall in with a Spanish privateer of fourteen guns, and capture her, after a severe action, in which seven of his men were killed and eight wounded,—nearly half his number; but, happily, he himself escaped without a scratch. It was a moment of exultation, to see the little Porghee coming round the point, with her prize, a vessel more like a sloop of war than a privateer! but a deep anxiety for the safety of our gallant friend, somewhat repressed the exultation, till we saw him leap on shore with his hat in one hand, and a sheathed cutlass in the other, calling out to me, as I stood on the rocks below Fort George, ready to receive him—"There she is, Sir Edward!!!"

This affair made work for Doctor Gordon; and he lost no time in attending to it. No distinction was made between our own wounded seamen and the prisoners: they were all lodged in the village, and equally well taken care of. The privateer carried seventy men, thirteen of whom had been killed, and twenty-three wounded: more than the whole number of Drake's crew. There was some valuable merchandise discovered to be on board the prize; cambrics, silks, cloves, and other articles of consideration. These the rascal had plundered out of a Dutchman; and after doing so, he scuttled poor Mynheer, and then put the crew on shore upon a small island. But he had also taken an English ship, the William and Mary, which he sent into La Guira; but as he could not spare many hands to send with her, he had only trusted the captain and mate to remain on board, the crew having been transferred to the privateer. These were released by the noble achievement of the Porghee; making a welcome addition to Drake's strength, at the moment of the capture.

This event incommoded us greatly. Both vessels required much repair, to enable them to proceed to Jamaica; but the wounded men were the cause of greatest anxiety, especially to my dear wife. The prisoners, too, required a guard; and that was very inconvenient: but I had, however, the consolation to consider how much worse it would have been, had we not got rid of the greater and worst part of the piratical body, before these unpleasant guests arrived. I therefore quietly and thankfully entered on the arrangements required for the occasion; and had the happiness to command those who faithfully and cheerfully carried them into execution: so that all that was needful, was done; and our works, and ordinary business, too, proceeded with little interruption.

Towards the end of June, Drake sailed with his prize for Jamaica; the English seamen taken in her, except two, having entered on board the Porghee. The story of the rich prize she made some months before, had no small weight in determining them to this step: besides, they had seen their new commander was a brave fellow; and, perhaps, they apprehended they might be pressed into some king's ship, they would not like so well, on their arrival at Port Royal, if they went there without being provided already. Thus the Porghee had her complement of men again; without which she could not have proceeded; as it required at least twelve men to navigate the prize. Four of the privateer's crew, who were Dutchmen, and two of the English sailors, that did not enter with Drake, he having filled up his complement, remained at the settlement; and I was glad at their volunteering to do so.

We seized this occasion of writing to England: not only to our friends, but I wrote an official letter to the Secretary of State, with an account of the capture of the piratical band; of the condemnation and execution of the Captain at Jamaica; requesting, in the sequel, that I might be allowed to divide the money and proceeds among the captors, and to know in what proportions the different persons were to share. By the same opportunity, I made a requisition for an artillery sergeant, and nine more artillerymen, from Jamaica; stating reasons which I deemed sufficient. Before Drake left us, he took the liberty of helping himself to a box of cambrics, and another of silks, from the prize; the contents of which he distributed among the ladies, saying, "they should be charged to his account:" and on his departure, he very handsomely made Doctor Gordon a present of 100 dollars, out of his own pocket, for his attendance on the wounded men.

In July, Drake returned, bringing the artillery-men with him; and it rejoiced us all to hear that he had received 22,000 dollars for his own share of the Spanish ship he took in November; and that the privateer was likely to prove a good prize also; as many persons seemed eager to buy her; and the goods she had on board, although not of much bulk, were of great value. The crew of the Porghee were now all flush of money, which they literally threw away among the people at the settlement. Drake remained with us for six weeks: indeed, it was by my particular desire that he did so. The Avon, meanwhile, was fitted with swivel stocks for four musketoons; and, with twelve men and a midshipman, well armed, was sent to cruise off the small Spanish islands to the southward; the weather being quite settled enough for a boat of her description to go to sea. This was done to satisfy Drake's men; for their money had made them restless. The midshipman put in command of the Avon, had orders to return in ten days, that another officer and other men might take their turn. This was done; and no accident happened to the boat on this service, during all its trips. But although she was nearly thirty days at sea, at different times, she took nothing, only a small black sloop with dye-woods, from the Magdalena River. This vessel I thought too insignificant to send to Jamaica for condemnation, especially as the crew had been landed on St. Andreas. I therefore sold both her and the cargo by auction, and divided the proceeds among the captors. Martin and Purdy bought the sloop, with money they had made by turtling; and my brother and Van Kempen purchased the dye-woods.

By the middle of August, the battery below Spring Hill* was completed; twelve twenty-three pounders mounted, and a flag-staff put up. Then, with some ceremony, I named it, after the gallant Admiral who had sent us the guns, "Fort Vernon." The workmen were now despatched to the other end of Edward's Island, to erect the projected two-gun battery there; and Xavier and Derrick were employed in building a barrack, for eight artillery-men, at Fort Vernon.

As there was no specific duty at present for the Porghée to do, besides cruising, Van Kempen asked me to let her take the galliot, and the prize sloop (which Purdy, very good-naturedly, had named the Jack Martin,) under convoy to the Bay of Honduras, and try what could be done there, as the Porto-Bello market was glutted by English traders. I agreed to his request. He, in consequence, chartered the black sloop; and on Wednesday, the 3d of September, they sailed for Belize River, taking letters for my cousin at St. George's Key. As Martin and Purdy were now become ship-owners, and went in their own vessel, I put the turtling business into the hands of John Stone and Harry Rock, my two sailor boys, whose term of bondage in a very short time would expire.

Ever since the sale of the pirate's hull, Allwood had been busy at intervals breaking her up; by which he had collected her planks and timbers, and a good deal of other timber besides, all brought to the small bay opposite, where the pirates' provisions used to be landed directly under the rock to the north, where the two-gun battery was now erecting. He proposed, with these materials, to build a small schooner at this place; and having consulted me on the subject, I promised him every facility. "As soon as the artillery barrack is finished," said I, "you shall have Allan Derrick and his apprentice; and I will do this for you, because I have, on all occasions, been well satisfied with your conduct: but I now feel something due to the man who lays down the first keel on Seaward Islands. Besides I wish to show you, Manus Allwood, that I have not forgotten your gallant conduct on the night we attacked the pirates; and for these considerations, I shall make no charge against you for the labour of my bondmen." Manus was gratified every way by what I had said; not only thanking me, but looking vastly pleased, a tulip blush having risen on his dingy cheek before I was done speaking to him. "Then, sir, if you please," observed the elder Allwood, "I will hire Xavier, with his apprentice, when they have done the work they are upon; and with these men, and ourselves, and our apprentices, we shall make good speed. And may I hope your Honour will have no objection for the smith to work for us?"—"Every man who is not a bondman, is free here, Mr. Allwood," I replied, "to do anything he pleases that is lawful: you have as much right to employ the smith as I have."

By the middle of October, the two-gun battery was finished; and by the help of the carpenters now at work on Allwood's vessel, the sergeant of artillery succeeded in getting up the two guns; and on the evening of the 15th he reported the battery complete, and fit for service. Orders were now given to have all the gun-carriages and guns painted at all the forts; and the persons employed on this business were afterwards directed to paint the great storehouse at the cave, and also the mansion, and all the houses belonging to it, to preserve the wood. This was an expensive and tedious operation, but so necessary that it could not be dispensed with.

The wages to the Spanish masons now amounted to 348 dollars; and as I had engaged to go on paying them, until I could send them home, I set them about building a handsome stone fountain of coral freestone at the village; to be in direct communication with the rock, whence the water first gushed forth. It was to be done, and was done, on a plan of their own, the Spaniards being well acquainted with such erections. This fountain was made to pour itself through the beautiful mouths of twelve large conchs, into a great reservoir below; the shells being cut across with a saw, so as to separate the spiral end, leaving the opening to the mouth unobstructed. The water was made to flow from the reservoir by conduits, as formerly filling our cistern; and thus irrigating our grounds below the silk-cotton tree, and supplying Van Kempen's people with an ample stream, to wash the grated roots of the Indian arrow-root. By this beautiful structure, the charms of the fountain were again displayed in all the elegance of an artful arrangement: but being robbed of their native simplicity, they failed to enchant us as on former days. The villagers, however, now received their water pure and cool, from the mouths of the gushing shells; and I regarded it altogether as a fine achievement.

Before the end of the month, the Tom Cod made its appearance, after rather a disastrous voyage, having run ashore with his cargo of flour and biscuit, near Cape Henry, one of the headlands of the Chesapeake. After being got off, unloaded, repaired, and reloaded, she again sailed, and put into Jamaica, being still rather leaky. There, fortunately, she found the English squadron from the Spanish Main; and at last sold her cargo well. She came down full of other merchandise. And, in a few days after, Drake came in with the galliot and sloop from the Bay of Honduras; having also had a very unpleasant and tedious voyage, although tolerably profitable to the merchants: but my cousin had left St. George's Key; therefore my letters to him were brought back.

As the 30th would be the anniversary of the birth-day of our august sovereign, I resolved to make it a festival. At sunrise, all the colours on the islands were hoisted; and as it was necessary to scale the Spanish guns, the forty-six pounders were fired from the promontory and Sugar-Loaf Hill, at the moment their flags went up. We had a grand field-day on the open ground between the mansion and the fort; and all the people, including the crews of the vessels, the Spanish masons, and the ten remaining pirates, were regaled under the canopy of the great silk-cotton tree. I gave a fine dinner also, at the mansion; and when the King's health was drank, a salute of twenty-one guns was fired from the batteries; beginning at Fort George below us, where the St. George's flag displayed itself; the salute being then taken up and finished by Fort Vernon. The people, still assembled, now cheered; a twenty-gallon cask of Spanish wine having been just served out among them, neither Spaniards nor pirates making any objection to drink to the health of the King of England. At nine o'clock the drums beat; and, to show a good example, all my guests at the mansion went away. The people, observing the movement, of course separated, and retired cheerfully to their respective homes.

Early in November, I settled with the Spanish masons, I hope to their satisfaction; and sent them off in the Porghee to Porto Bello, accompanied by Van Kempen, and the three merchant vessels, to try that market once more. I still retained the ten pirates, finding them not only useful, but orderly; and I had released them from their state of slavery, on the King's birthday. I then restored to them the money and other things that had been found in their pockets at the time of their being made prisoners, and told them they should have wages, henceforth, for their labour. These men eventually proved themselves regenerate, in the ordinary acceptance of the word, some of them serving in our vessels as sailors, and two of them settling in the village, and plying as ferrymen between St. George's and Allwood's Bay.

Our numbers were now very much increased, not only by the accession of adult persons, but by births, which had been numerous; and the young generation was springing up around us, almost beyond knowledge; but the most agreeable reflection, was in knowing that they were growing up in industry, and in the fear of God.

"Ah, dear Edward!" said my beloved Eliza, as she and I sat one evening retired together on the parapet of the fort, to enjoy the sight of the descending sun; "how delightful is this goodly scene; how smooth the lake; how beautiful the surrounding shores! And how happy the people of these islands, under your protection ; how happy I, at this moment, too, in being so near to you, and alone ! My heart now dilates with gratitude to our God. I always feel his presence most, when we are separate from every earthly being but ourselves. How gracious he has been to me ! how he has preserved you in moments of great peril ; how he has blessed you in everything ! No human power, nor foresight, could have made this place what it is, without his special favour. Oh, may the people praise him ! may we ever be grateful to him, my Edward !” As she finished speaking, her fair head gradually sunk upon my bosom, shedding such tears as holy angels would love to gather ; but which a holier one preserves unseen, as germs of future joy.

Early in December, Drake returned from Porto Bello with his three vessels under convoy ; and in a few days after, he proceeded to Jamaica, taking my brother’s schooner with him deeply laden. He did not delay on this voyage, but made haste to return home, on account of the approaching stormy season ; and came to anchor again, with the Tom Cod in company, on the 18th. He brought us letters, one of which was from the Secretary of State, on the subject of the money taken from the pirates. It stated, that an objection had been raised to my request, on the score of its being droit of admiralty : but on referring to my grant, the objection was overruled ; and he had it in command from his Majesty, to allow the money and proceeds of the wreck to be shared by myself and the people who had attacked the pirates in their camp, and made them prisoners ; saying, that I had a right to three-eighths of the whole ; and that I had permission to divide and distribute the remainder among the persons actually engaged, in such proportions as, in strict justice, I might think them respectively entitled to.

On the 20th, which was Saturday, the muster took place as usual; and I took the occasion to read the Secretary of State's letter: the troops (if I may so call them,—and why not, for they are all brave musketeers?) being drawn up round me in a hollow square. When I finished the letter, they gave me three cheers, and I then appointed Monday to pay the money.

On Monday the people assembled on the open ground before the mansion. I stated to them, that there were nine bags with 1000 pieces of eight, hammered cobs, in each; the cob being in value 3s. 4d. English money, but in Jamaica currency 5s.; and there were four bags, containing 17,200 piastres; each piastre being two ryals, viz. the fourth of one cobbed piece of eight. "That is," continued I, "the fourth of one piece of eight ryals. I wish you to understand the value of the coin you are to receive. These sums together, make 13,300 pieces of eight. Besides which, the wreck, and other things, sold for 432 dollars. Now, each dollar may be estimated at 4s. 6d. English money, or 6s. 6d. or 6s. 8d. Jamaica currency, which may be equal to ten ryals and a half; but 12 of the dollars have been paid to the vendue master; so that there remains of them only 420. If the money were all in pieces of eight," said I, it would be easily divided; however, if I give three dollars, as a part of every hundred cobs, it will come right, I think; so, with this understanding, I take 5145 pieces to myself, which includes 153 hard dollars." I added, "This is my share, as Governor and Commandant of the island; and as such, I cannot refuse it; for, in fact, by taking it, I do very little more than reimburse myself for the expense I have been at in feeding the pirates, and the Spanish masons, for so many months, while they were engaged in making batteries for the general security." And I added to this fair statement, that I had paid the Spanish masons, and Hart, upwards of 500 dollars in wages; and it had cost me a considerable sum of money in erecting the barracks for the artillery-men: and much still remained to be done; so that I hoped the people would see that I should put very little, or perhaps none, of the money into my own pocket in the end. The explanation was perfectly satisfactory. Every man now received 150 pieces each; the three Corporals, 200 each; and Sergeant Craig 300; and Dr. Gordon, 1000.

The money being thus distributed, I said, taking from my pocket the small bag of emeralds I had found on the pirate Captain,—“Here are some emeralds: I do not know what they are worth; nor can I know, until they are sent to England; but if you will confide them to me, I will take care that you shall have their value among you, when they can be sold.” They all cried out with one voice,—“Keep them!—give them to our honoured lady.” They then called for Lady Seaward; on which I sent Diego to tell her the people desired to see her. Mr. Rowley followed Diego; and soon after, my dear wife appeared, leaning on Mr. Rowley’s arm; the people cheering, and making way for her to pass. In a few minutes, I took her by the hand. For a moment there was a dead silence. Master Diego, who had followed from the mansion, now stepped forward; and, taking off his hat, spoke as follows:—“Brave and good men, I speak because I am old man. My good master, your Governor and mine, took me from canoe, with Xavier and our wives, nearly starved and perished: my kind mistress, your lady and mine, fed us and our wives; she caught the fish with her own hand that fed us; for this, I ask to be the one to give the emeralds to our lady, as a token of our love and duty.” As Diego finished, the people cheered him. I then put the little bag into his hand; on which, kissing the ground, he laid it at Lady Seaward's feet, saying,—“Diego's heart is with it.” My dear wife gently took the bag from the ground, when Diego laid it down; and also taking up his last sentence, she said, in an under tone—“I value your own gift, my honest and faithful Diego, not less than these jewels.” She then would have addressed the people, but her voice failed: but she wrapped the little bag in her cambrick handkerchief, and put it in her bosom,—“Tell them, my Edward,” said she, “that I accept the jewels, and will wear them as I would do their affections—at once my pride and ornament.” I repeated her words aloud: and after a little more cheering, the people retired; and my dear Eliza, leaning on my arm, walked with a slow and pensive step up to our residence.

When we sat down, she trembled, and changed colour. —“You are ill, love,” I said.—“I am overcome, Edward,” she replied: “this is too much for me! An injury, or an injustice, I know how to bear; it is my duty: but this mark of honour, this almost devotion, from the people! and then our faithful Diego, how he showed himself on the occasion! it is all too much.” A tear, that natural solace of strong feeling, came to her relief, and restored her to herself: then smiling, she took the hands of Mrs. Rowley and Rosalie, who stood over her, saying, “My kind friends!”

In the evening, my brother James and his wife came to see us, when I took the opportunity to speak to him about Jacob his bondman, who had been wounded in the affair with the pirates. I said it was my wish that the year and a half he had to serve, should be remitted; and as I found that I had 175 pieces of eight in hand by mistake, belonging to the captors, I would give it for the man's manumission, if the men it belonged to did not object, which I was sure they would not do.—“The man is very useful to me,” said my brother; “he is my right hand man; I cannot replace him; the money is no object compared to his services. I do not wish to let him go; but at any rate I will not take any money for it, if I do: and I certainly dare not refuse, if you desire it, because I had him from you as a gift on my first coming to the island.”—“Then do the thing handsomely, brother,” I replied, “next muster day; and what you lose by the man's services, you will gain by the people's good-will and mine.”—“I will do it,” he said; “but now we are on the subject,” continued he, “I must tell you, that I think both Van Kempen and myself not well treated, as officers of the Train-Band, that we did not share with the others in the distribution of the money found with the pirates.” In reply to this, I showed him the Secretary of State's letter, in which it said, “Among the persons actually engaged.”—“If any one has a right to complain,” cried I, “it is Drake, who saved the wreck from complete destruction, and may be said to have taken possession of her on the strand. But you are not wronged, brother,” continued I, “you are the last man I would defraud of his right: and I hope I would not defraud any man.” Here the subject rested. We now lighted a cigar, and finished the evening in talking over his success in trade, and quickly accumulating wealth, which acted on him like a cordial, so that we parted in great good humour and brotherly love.”

The Thursday following being Christmas-day, large preparations were made for its celebration; and I thought this a fine opportunity for James to release his bondman Jacob; who had been one of Diego's patriarchs, mentioned often in the early part of this diary. When all the settlement was gathered together, I formed the people round me in a ring, with our revered pastor, my brother, and Jacob, standing by me. I then addressed the people in these words:—"By some mistake there remained 175 pieces of eight of the pirates' money unappropriated, and also some gold pieces found in the Captain's pocket. It was my intention to propose to you that it should be paid to Mr. Seaward to purchase the remainder of the bondage of this brave man (pointing to Jacob), who was wounded in the service of the public; but Mr. Seaward will not accept of it; he stands here to give the man his freedom, on this day, and at this place, as a reward of bravery." The people cheered. My brother then took Jacob by the hand, saying, "You are free: go where you please." They cheered again.—"I think, good Master Seaward," said Jacob, as soon as he could be heard, "I am free; and now, if Master Seaward please, I will go back to Peccary Field to-night, and free Jacob and bondman Jacob will be just the same."—"I will divide the money among you," resumed I to the people.—"No! no!" was the reply from many; then, after a little pause, and some stir among them, John Reynolds, one of the settlers from Carolina, came forward, and said,—"It is the people's wish that the money be made an offering to our worthy clergyman.—We desire you will accept of it, Mr. Rowley. We owe you much on our own accounts, and on behalf of our children, and we know how little you get for all you do." Mr. Rowley bowed, saying, "In the same spirit you give, so I receive. Good people, I return you my thanks for this mark of your esteem."

We now left them to their amusements; and as the Porghee and all the other vessels were in port, the sailors contributed not a little to the jollity and drollery of the scene. The flags were flying on all the heights, and at all the forts, and the vessels displayed their colours. At twelve o'clock the people sat down to a plenteous feast—turtle, mutton, pigs, and poultry, and when they were all seated, having now a good store of gunpowder, a salute of twenty-one guns was fired from Fort George; and they then set to in the true English style of rejoicing. The day went off well and soberly; which I was glad to see, for I knew there was a great deal of wine on the island belonging to different persons. I had prohibited spirits as contraband; but as the people were becoming rich, I felt I must concede something; I therefore had allowed wine to be bought and sold; still no intemperance, even among the Germans or sailors, took place.

On the following day all the vessels were moved into Peccary Creek, for safety against the storms which we now might expect to visit us. The muster on Saturday was dispensed with, the people being desired to remain at their homes, and secure every thing against the breaking up of the weather. It however still remained fine; the people assembling as usual to prayers on the Sabbath. At night, however, the rains began, but unattended by anything like a hurricane, or even a gale of wind; and so they continued with little intermission for five days, pouring down in torrents.

On the evening of the 2d of January the sky brightened up; and on the next day the people throughout the island began the important operation of putting in their crops.

CHAPTER XII.

WHEN our agricultural labours were accomplished, all the vessels put to sea on a commercial errand, under convoy of Captain Drake. The Avon was now our guardship, having been painted and refitted, with two pattereras mounted on the bow, and two musquetoons abaft. I was pleased to have this clever little boat so well equipped, lying at anchor off the fort, ready for any service that might be required.

I now made a point of seeing that all the artillery-men were properly accommodated, and completed every arrangement connected with them and their department. The sergeant and men stationed at Fort Vernon were comfortably lodged, and their provision-grounds put in good order. Two of the artillery-men were appointed to reside at the two-gun battery on the northern extremity of Edward's Island, which we called Pirates' Fort. A snug house had been built for them, and some ground not far from the rock, allotted to it, and a negro, with a small canoe, directed to attend at the station. The three artillery-men that first arrived continued to do duty at Fort St. George; and all these persons were allowed island pay, in addition to the King's. I took care that all our people, both of the Train Band and vessels, were exercised by the artillery-men at great guns in the fort, when occasion offered: that is, the Train Band always on muster days; and the crews of the vessels when in port, and their ordinary duties would permit.

It may not be improper to mention in this place, that ever since John Reynolds made the speech to Mr. Rowley, in the name of the people, I regarded him with some attention; for I was much struck at the time by the propriety, if not elegance, of his manner and diction on that occasion. It now happened, that in a conversation I held with him, he confessed to me that he was the son of a squire in the West of England; that he had been wild and unmanageable from his boyhood, often running away from school, and afterwards not settling to any profession or business; that at the age of twenty-one he married a poor girl, his present wife, whose person he could not otherwise obtain; and that by this act, in addition to many others of greater delinquency, he had exposed himself to the just reproaches of his father, and to the alienation of his countenance and support. Finding himself in this merited situation, covered with shame, and penniless, he took advantage of the government offer, to send persons free of expense to Georgia; whither he went, to bury himself from his family and his friends; but, as I already knew, he never reached that place, having sailed from Carolina to settle here. "And I am very glad," continued he, "that I did so."—"It will be your own fault, sir," said I to the poor fellow, "if you have not reason to be glad; for if you prove yourself worthy of my confidence and friendship, I will endeavour to serve you. But if I take you by the hand, do not venture to try me, as you did your father. An accumulation of disobedience, was even too much for him to bear; and what he could not forgive, it is not to be expected that a stranger would overlook." I then invited him to quit Allwood's Bay, where he was submissively living with another family in one house; and take up his residence in the village, where I would give him a house rent free, and recommend him to the attention of my brother and Van Kempen; who, I rather thought, would be glad to employ him as a clerk, until something better turned up for him. I then assured him I would take care he and his wife, and little child, should not starve. After this conversation, Mr. Reynolds removed to George Town; where he conducted himself well, in a short time becoming highly respected by Mr. Rowley and myself, and by every one in the islands. Nature had done a great deal for him: he was a man of quick parts, and of humane disposition, highly sensible now of every kindness shown to him.

In the advanced state of our settlement, minor matters are no longer objects for record; but, during the early part of this year, little has occurred of greater importance. It may, however, be stated, that Drake took two prizes of some value: our industry, and commerce, and wealth increased: some marriages and some births took place; and among the latter I was again an uncle. Allwood launched his schooner in May, which he called the Lady Seaward; and having discovered a number of fine cedar trees, on the western acclivity of Allwood's Ridge, I sent the sawyers there, and in July laid down a schooner of a hundred tons, on the slope of the creek, where my dear wife and myself first found shelter and safety, at the close of the memorable year 1733.

About this time I received a letter from Captain Knight, my fellow-sufferer at Porto Bello. He had arrived in England last August, in the Torrington, in company with the Diamond, Captain Knowles. My friend Frazer's evil genius, Knight, had paid the money to my banker, I lent him at Porto Bello; and his letter was merely to say so, besides thanking me. By the same opportunity I received also letters from my bankers, and one from Gloucestershire, with a long account of the destructive consequences of the severe and continued frost of January and February of last year; accompanied, however, by pleasing details of the great good our dear and revered Mr. Goldsmith had done, and was still doing, by the means I had afforded him; for which not only the poor, but my tenantry, were sensibly grateful. Well, notwithstanding all this, my banker's account had continued to improve; and I bless God that he never suffered my bowels of compassion to be shut up, or my hand to close, against my fellow-creatures, and still he increased my wealth: my riches multiplied, without my bestowing a thought or a care about them; but I was neither extravagant nor improvident. Our forts were built with the pirates' money, and there yet remained of it more than 2000 dollars for other purposes.

The accounts I received of the ill success of the grand expedition made against Carthagena in the spring, vexed me a good deal. I was hurt, because of the failure of his Majesty's arms; but I was sorry that the gallant Admiral had in some degree sacrificed the interests of his country to his dislike or contempt of military men. He had evinced that contempt last year, in his reception of Captain Frazer; and he was accused of it in conducting the attack on Carthagena. However, it cannot be denied that General Wentworth wanted either zeal or knowledge; however much Vernon may be blamed, for seeing, and feeling, and acting on the conviction. But be all this as it may, I had great reason, in consequence, to be very uneasy on our own account; having received intimation that Don Blas de Leso had declared "the English should not now be allowed to hold a hawk's nest in their seas," alluding to our settlement.

Towards the autumn, several Kingston privateers rendezvoused here; and some prizes were brought in. They petitioned me to apply for a regular Admiralty Court, that we might have power to try and condemn the prizes, but I would not do it. They were a great nuisance to the place, so that although they spent some money in it, I heartily desired never to see any of them come into the harbour. Unfortunately, I had felt myself compelled to license a house in the village to sell wine and punch; but as I had found it impossible to prevent the ingress of spirits, I put the high duty of one dollar a gallon on it, whether rum, brandy, or Hollands; while I permitted wine of every description to be landed duty free, the ad valorem import excepted.

I found it now no easy matter to keep that good order we hitherto had done, especially in the village. Mr. Rowley preached, and I was vigilant; but something more was requisite. I appointed Craig town-major, and ordered every one to repair to their vessels, when the drum beat off at nine o'clock. Money became so abundant towards the end of the year, that my dear wife, and Mrs. Rowley, as well as myself, trembled for the consequences.—I saw no remedy, but directing its expenditure into channels the least injurious; I therefore encouraged the people to dress well, to improve the appearance of their houses and furniture, and to enjoy the comforts of tea and coffee, and wine, at their own homes; all of which I effected to a certain extent, and thereby kept the greater part of the men from idling and drinking at the village. Every Saturday we held our military parade and muster, and that day was appointed also for a market at the Black Rock. Money was now the medium in all transactions, so that things were bought or sold with great facility.

But all my efforts to preserve the orderly conduct that had previously existed, were unavailing; so that at last I was compelled to tell the people, that if they did not keep apart from the privateer's men, I should be obliged either to make them do military duty continually, or to apply to Jamaica for a company of soldiers, who could not be paid without laying a heavy poll-tax on every one of them. This was a most unpleasant state of things. A profusion of money, the introduction of wine and spirits, and the presence of our profligate visitors, were the principal, if not the sole causes of all this disorder. My dear wife, in anguish of spirit at what she saw, often said to me, "O my Edward, if we do not take great care, the fate of Port Royal must be ours!" After much perplexity, and frequent counsel with those I loved and esteemed, I resolved (at hazard of proceeding illegally), to forbid any privateers entering the harbour, unless in distress. And I took the earliest opportunity of informing those in port of my determination. Accordingly, henceforward, I did not suffer one of them to come in, but warned them off, when they approached: and, if they persisted, gave them a hint from the forty-six-pounder on the promontory, that I was in earnest.

By this measure, I eventually got rid of them; and in a short time after, it was my great happiness to see the people to a man, return to their industrious and sober habits. Of late I had made it a rule to visit one or more of the settlements every day, and always the village, attended by my orderly; and since the disorder in the island, I found it necessary to observe more state in my appearance. I dressed well every day, and caused all the principal persons connected with me to do the same. I wished to rule by love only, but circumstances had obliged me to make the people feel they must also stand in awe of my authority; and this could not be done without having recourse to appearances, as well as to vigilant circumspection. Prevention of crime was my object. I trembled at the idea of having recourse to punishment.

By the end of the year, perhaps some good, and I hope not much evil, had remained, as the result of our intercourse with the privateers' men. The characters of individuals had been somewhat developed; and most happy am I to remember, that all my early friends and associates, negroes as they are, never were contaminated. We had improved in all the arrangements of social life; uses were found for money in this way, by which a salutary emulation was excited; an emulation for something beyond a hut, a garment, and a meal; and evidences of it were to be seen at every habitation within and without, and in the dress of the inhabitants.

By a strict observance of divine worship, by the blessing of God, by precept, and by example, and by strict and impartial justice, and a due vigilance, I had the satisfaction, when our Christmas came round, to see and to feel that we were again what we before had been: and I took the occasion which that sacred day afforded me, to address the people at some length. I endeavoured to show them how narrowly they had escaped destruction, and how thankful I was to Almighty God to see them again restored to his favour: and I trusted in future that no bad example, nor any other motive, should induce a single individual of them to desert the path of duty; but that they would all live orderly, industriously, and soberly; as many present had done hitherto without wavering, through all the temptations which the licentious strangers had thrown in their way. I concluded with recommending them to the protection of Almighty God, for the sake of Him, whose incarnation we were about to commemorate with thanksgivings and rejoicings. And I desired them now to enjoy themselves in all mirth with sobriety. They did not cheer me—I was glad they did not—but a more grateful sound reached my ears—

“We are sorry that any should have offended. We have no complaint to make. The Governor has done well.”—“I am satisfied,” I replied; “I am your friend as well as your Governor.” They now cried, “Long live Sir Edward!” as I left the ground, accompanied by Drake and Mr. Rowley. My dear wife anxiously awaited my arrival at the mansion, to know the result of my address to the people. For this year had been a year of great anxiety and uneasiness to us on their account; and it was gratifying to her kind heart to hear how well they had received my admonition.

We commenced the year very well: the people were not only rich, but industrious; and the public coffers also in good case. Our produce for export was of some value, especially hats, Indian arrow-root, cigars, and stockings; besides now above twenty bags of cotton had been picked and cleaned. In the spring my schooner was launched, which I called the Francis Drake, in compliment to my friend. When she was rigged and fitted for sea, I sold her to Mr. Reynolds at a remunerating price; and took his bond for the amount. We had now five merchant vessels; and the genius of Van Kempen found employment for them all. Some settlers in the meanwhile had come from Jamaica; several houses were built in the village at private expense; and the whole ground became occupied, so that I found it necessary to devise a plan for dividing the woodland regions, by which I proposed to keep about two-thirds of it, next to the silk-cotton tree plantation, as a park for the deer; and to cut down all the trees in the other part, to make room for extending the village.

At the suggestion of Mr. Rowley, I now raised a square shed on four pillars at each horn of Fort George, large enough to receive fifty persons in each. These sheds or open halls were pleasant places to sit down in at any time of the day, and promised to be useful for men on duty, or others, to retire to, from the scorching rays of the sun. The roofs were boarded, and painted a lead colour; the pillars green: looking well from the lake, being not only useful but ornamental.

This was the first year of jubilee on the island; and, in consequence, some of my brother's bond-servants, but more of my own, would receive their freedom. To be prepared for this event, we made an accession of twelve male and nine female young negroes from Kingston, placing them under the same conditions of bondage with those that had preceded them. On the 9th of April, John Stone and Harry Rock, the two sailor boys, and Allan Derrick, the ship carpenter, and Priscilla his wife, and three other negro women, received their freedom in form; proclamation having been made on the spot, for any man to come forward and say why the person whose name was now called should not be free. In July, Abel, Noah, and David, Diego's patriarchs, had their manumission; Jacob, their fellow, having been freed by my brother before, as has already been related. And in December, Harold and Marcus, the sawyers, with seven other men, five of whom were the artificers' apprentices, and four women also, received their freedom from bondage. The law of the settlement was thus established: the act done, would be referred to as a precedent.

CHAPTER XIII.

IN September, the Sea-Horse, Captain Limeburner, arrived from Jamaica, with despatches for me, on his way to the Spanish Main. Being afraid to approach the island, he hove to at a great distance from the promontory, and fired a gun, making the usual signal for a pilot, the union-jack at the foretop-gallant-mast head. This was answered by the great gun at the flag-staff, our colours being already up. A boat was instantly despatched to pilot him in. I ordered the bugle to sound, and all the men to be put under arms. He saluted us with thirteen guns, as he approached Fort Vernon; and, as he hauled up for the anchorage at Fort George, we returned his salute from the battery. The flags were flying on Sugar-Loaf Hill, on the height above German Town, and at the three forts. Drake waited on him directly after he dropped anchor; and they came on shore together. He was received with a sergeant's guard; and the two sentinels, placed for the occasion before the mansion, presented arms to him as he put his foot on the step of the piazza. I met him there with all due courtesy.

After the moment of ceremony was over—"Here are despatches for you, sir," he said; adding, almost in the same breath, "what a thundering piece of ordnance you have got on the height above us here! we were all surprised by its report, so many leagues off. What a place this is!" continued he, with an air of great surprise. "I see nothing around me but flags and forts, and soldiers. I expected to find a miserable, blackguard hole, like the Caymanas; but this is another Gibraltar!" I smiled as he spoke, making no other reply than "I am happy to see you here, sir," and then begged permission to read the despatches he had brought me, and went aside for that purpose.

Without much preamble, they set forth grievous complaints, as made by the owners and captains of privateers; followed by a remonstrance, and something like a rap over the knuckles, for denying them rendezvous at Seaward Islands. The next matter, was relative to making a settlement at the island of Rattan, near Cape Honduras; requesting I would send Lieutenant Drake to the Mosquito shore, to co-operate with Lieutenant Hodgson about supplies for the troops, and workmen now employed on the forts and town already in progress on that island; and to do every thing in my power to forward or succour the undertaking. This overteeming despatch concluded by observing that, of course, I was aware of the Spaniards having taken possession of Porto Bello, and that a large naval force of the enemy was at this time collected at that port.

After reading the packet, I put it in my pocket, and desired to know how long we should have the honour of Captain Limeburner's company, hoping he would not sail very soon. "I will stay a few days," he replied, "if I may get any fresh provisions for the ship's company. I had but just dropped the anchor at Port Royal, after a long cruise, when I received orders to put to sea for the Spanish Main, and with your despatches. All hands on board will soon be eat up with the scurvy, if I don't look sharp. Can we buy any fresh prog here, such as turtle and vegetables? I should like the lads to refresh a little, before we go on active service again." Instead of making him any reply, I addressed myself to Diego, who stood, full dressed, under the arch that separates the two halls. "Let a supply of turtle, and yams, and plantains, and pumpkins, and melons, for one hundred and twenty men, be sent on board the frigate immediately; and to-morrow morning, at sunrise, let them have a full supply of fish; and every day while his Majesty's ship remains here let them have the same." Diego bowed profoundly and retired. Captain Limeburner stared, and, being an ugly fellow with a cast in his eye, it was difficult to guess whom he looked at. Drake was ridiculously moved, either by Master Diego's bow, or by the naval captain's astonishment; and finding it impossible to preserve his gravity, he walked away into the back hall. "You don't mean this as a present, Sir Edward!" said the Captain.—"I do," I replied.—"I did not fish for that," he rejoined: "my crew are flush of money; let them buy what they want. I could give the purser an order to purchase, if there was need of that; but I wish to see the fellows eased of their cash; it's as bad to them as the nightmare; they are never easy till they get clear of it." In consequence of this declaration, I requested Drake to call back Diego, and countermand the order.

Mr. and Mrs. Rowley, with Mademoiselle Filibert, now made their appearance, and soon after Lady Seaward came in; on which the stranger was introduced. He endeavoured to be very agreeable, appearing to be mightily taken with the ladies, and soon got into conversation with them; but it was all about this wonderful place. "He had made the land at the risk of his ship; he never saw a place so beset with shoals and breakers. If the directions he got from the Master Attendant at Jamaica, had not been very clear, he could not have done it."—"What marks did he give you, sir?" said Drake, interrupting him.—"To keep well to the eastward of the Seranillas," he replied; "and when I got into 14° 30' north, to steer due west, and keep a good look out a-head."—"I am happy no accident happened to you, Captain Limeburner!" said my dear wife; for these shores are so dangerous of approach, that I should have trembled, had I known so large a vessel as yours was endeavouring last night to make her way to the land."—"As to the matter of that, madam," replied he, "we are but a cock-boat, where there is plenty of water; but no seaman likes your reefs and breakers, running twelve or fourteen leagues off shore; and I hope you don't laugh at me." This was an unexpected and unmerited retort to my gentle Eliza's kind and sincere assurance of the interest she took in his safety; but at once she made him this reply: "You are accustomed to rough and brave companions, Captain Limeburner; we are not brave enough to jest with another's feelings, or to laugh when the question at issue is life or death. As I felt, so I spoke; and I am happy to see you here in safety."—"I ask your Ladyship's pardon," said the honest tar: "I thought you might please to be witty at my expense; ladies do so sometimes. An Admiral's wife made me look very foolish, not long ago, by a joke; but I won't repeat it; none but sailors and sailors' wives are up to it." Our visiter was now again in good humour, and began to expatiate on the amazement every thing he saw here, had produced in his mind. He had looked for nothing but reefs without, and rocks within,—a few fishermen's huts and some negroes,—a poor miserable place; but all was truly wonderful! "Why," said he, directing one of his eyes through the open doors to the east, while the other, I think, was cast on Rosalie, "I have not seen anything like that beautiful water-spout, since I was at Hampton Court." My courteous wife thanked him for deigning to compare anything here, with what he had seen at the palace of our gracious King; but Rosalie never having heard a jet d'eau called a water-spout before, or for some other reason, covered her face with her handkerchief.

In about an hour the gallant Captain left us; and shortly after I prepared to return his visit, not forgetting to give immediate directions for apprising the shopkeepers at the village, and the settlers generally, that the frigate's crew would purchase from them articles of merchandise and produce. "Tell the German women, Diego," said I, "they will now find a good market for their stockings."

I went on board in state, accompanied by Drake, and was received with military honours. Although the ship had not been three hours at anchor, she was moored, the sails were furled, the yards squared, the decks clear, and the awnings spread, the ship's company clean, and the marines dressed. There was no clamour nor noise, every thing bore testimony that a ship was Captain Limeburner's proper station in life. The officers were introduced to me one by one: I spoke to each of them, on whatever happened to strike my mind at the time. I was shown round the ship; on the appearance of which I endeavoured to pass suitable compliments; and on my return to the quarter-deck, I requested the pleasure of seeing Captain Limeburner with his officers at dinner; which invitation they readily accepted.

Having thus finished my visit of ceremony to the frigate, I returned to the mansion, attended by my friend Drake. As soon as seated, I gave him my despatches to read; after which we had a long conference on the subject of the settlement, making at the island of Rattan. But the dinner-hour being near at hand, he was obliged to leave me to bring Mrs. Drake from Spring Hill, before we could finish the conference.

At the appointed time our guests from the frigate arrived, and we sat down to fare, as sumptuous as the island could produce. Here again was matter of astonishment, and agreeable surprise to our wondering friend. —“What! and mutton too!” cried he.—“Yes;” I replied, “and I shall have the pleasure of sending some of it alive, for you and your officers to take to sea.”—The officers thanked me: Limeburner said nothing. The dinner went off very well: it could not be otherwise; the table was covered with delicacies, the cooking capital, and the servants in attendance numerous and handy; my wines also were excellent, but our naval guests hinted that a bowl of punch would be preferred; so, accordingly a royal bowl of lime-punch was produced, having one of my elegant punch-ladles, with a doubloon in the bottom, to serve it. The officers did justice to the beverage, and became very merry; but on coffee being announced, we all joined the ladies in the other hall; having made an arrangement to visit Allwood's Bay next morning, and dine with Captain Drake, at an early hour.

After my guests were gone, I sent for Town-Major Craig, and gave him particular directions as to the guard, the sentinels, the wine-house in the village, and every other matter that I thought required vigilance during the stay of the frigate; my policy being always to guard against mischief.

The next morning early, Lady Seaward, and Mr. and Mrs. Rowley, with Mademoiselle Filibert, (Fidele, who had now grown both fat and lazy, being left behind, to keep the little girls company,) went to Spring Hill in the barge, and breakfasted with my sister. Drake was up before the sun, and on board the Porghee, getting her ready for sea; but he returned to the château with Captain Limeburner, and three of his officers, and a young midshipman, about noon. The whole party instantly set forward to see the fort, and explore the corkscrew road to the summit of the hill. We proceeded directly through the first gate; the road winding from thence to the westward, our backs being turned on the fort. "I should like to see the fort first," said Captain Limeburner.— "We are going there now, sir," replied Drake.— "A rum way to get to a place," cried the Captain — "to make sail from it." I smiled, and we kept on our course, following the gradual ascent of the road, from east to west, from west to north, from north to east; at which point we found ourselves at the drawbridge. "Well, this is capital!" exclaimed our companion, as we passed over into the fort. The artillery-men were all at their post; and he showed great pleasure in examining the guns, and in talking to the men about the weight of metal and some other points. "This fort is well placed," he observed, "for giving a raking fire to any ship coming in from the southward." I told him to whom I was indebted for the plan. We now left the fort, and proceeded to ascend the hill in the same direction. On coming round, so as to be over the gate by which we entered, we came to the grotto that had given Drake the first motive for making a winding path up this ascent. Much pains had been taken since its first discovery, to adorn it. Coralines and sea-fans, and large beautiful shells, were placed around in great profusion; but all so disposed, as not to produce an idea of confusion or superabundance. Having admired this enchanting cavern awhile, we continued our route; for although we were ascending, yet so gradual was the slope (being only an elevation of one foot in twenty), that an acclivity was scarcely perceptible. The effects this spiral road gave to the eye of the spectator, with respect to the surrounding scenery, were truly astonishing: at every step something was seen and something lost sight of; and although we came round and round again and again, upon every object that is in view of the hill, yet by constantly varying the ascent we varied the aspect of the prospect. At length we arrived on the platform, from whence the coup-d'œil was truly delightful; but the large gun riveted the attention of our companion. "I suppose," said he, "it is the fellow to this, you have got on the other height." I told him it was. "And the Spaniards," exclaimed he, "allowed Porto Bello to be taken, with guns such as these to defend it! the lubbers!—With this gun, in this place, Sir Edward," continued he, "you should beat the devil out of the bay, if he were to come in." Saying this, he put his hand in his pocket, and gave the serjeant of artillery a dollar, to drink the King's health. We then retraced our steps; and having, of course, to wind back in an opposite direction, the scenery became so changed, in the succession of objects to the eye, that it scarcely appeared the same landscape.

We had just time to put off our coats to cool, so as to dress for dinner after the fashion of old Commodore Gunman, when dinner was announced. Drake gave us a complete course of fish and shell-fish, followed by a boiled turkey and a fine Dutch ham, a roast kid, a raised pie, and a brace of Mrs. Allwood's gallenos. After dinner, he showed what the island could produce for a dessert: pine-apples, melons, shaddocks, oranges, and bananas, all surrounding a royal bowl of punch, made with our own limes, were placed on the table. Some odd things were said at dinner by our nautical visitors, which made our ladies smile; but I will only repeat one of them. When the roast kid was brought on table entire, and with his head erect, a young midshipman present mistook it for a dog; and the moment it was set down, and he gave it a glance, he cried out, bow wow!"—"O no," said

Rosalie, who sat next him; "c'est un chevreau."—"He is a queer shaver, sure enough," replied the boy; "but you must not gull me with an outlandish name; may be you called him Pompey."

After dinner, the conversation turned on the uniform worn by the navy. "I have heard," said I, "that his present Majesty, having determined on giving a uniform to the navy, was led to make choice of that you wear, from seeing a blue riding dress, with white lappelles, on an elegant and beautiful lady of high rank, at a hunting party."—"That's Betty Martin!" replied Captain Limeburner.—"Who?" I rejoined.—"O, it's all my eye, that," he exclaimed: "nothing but a cram for land-lubbers." After pausing a moment, and looking a good deal vexed, one eye resting on me, the other directed to the harbour, he resumed:—"Why, our uniform was worn by Admiral Noah; ay, and before his time: Old Ocean himself wore it time out of mind. You have noticed his blue jacket, I suppose, and have seen his white lappelles, when he puts on his full-dress uniform: and he always wears that, d'ye see, in a gale of wind."—"Thank you, noble Captain," I replied; "I shall not forget to note that down, as a brave assay to reflect honour on the coat you wear." Before nine o'clock we all left the château, having previously invited our naval friends to visit us on the morrow, it being muster-day.

On returning to our own home, my Eliza asked me what Captain Limeburner could mean by saying "That's Betty Martin." I told her, in reply, I was as much at a loss to know his meaning, as she could be, at the time he spoke it; but I now recollected having heard the expression at school, where it was a common joke with the Latin scholars. Its origin I believe to be in a Romish prayer to Saint Martin, which begins,—"O mihi! Beate Martini!" and as far as that goes, may literally be translated,—“O to me, blessed Martin;” but which jocosely may be read,—“Oh, my eye, Betty Martin!” and this I believe to be the origin of Limeburner’s exclamation.

On the following day there was a grand market at the village. Boat-loads of sailors came on shore from the frigate, and bought largely; chiefly stockings and hats, and plait for hats; also some shopkeepers’ goods; no small quantity of tobacco and vegetables; and having taken a great liking to Gortz’s sausages, he supplied them abundantly. Captain Limeburner landed his marines a little before noon. Our train-band then fell in; and we mustered nearly one hundred rank and file, exclusive of the strangers. The marines beat us in exercise; but our men beat them hollow in firing at the target. Captain Limeburner was very angry at this, threatening to flog the marines if they did not do better. “Don’t blame the men, sir,” said Craig, respectfully, who stood by us: “give them practice, and they will fire well;—no man can do anything well, that he does not do often.” The naval captain, with one eye still fixed on the marines, cast a piercing glance on poor Craig with the other, saying in reply, “Who the d—l are you, to prevent me flogging my marines, if I like it?” On which Craig again respectfully put his hand to his hat, and walked away to the left.

After the business of the day was over, we all dined on board the frigate. The dinner was rude, but hearty. There was some excellent peas-soup; a great pilau of three boiled fowls, stuck full of cloves, and smothered in a pile of rice; a double piece of ship’s pork; a calipee of turtle baked in the oven; a baked plum-pudding; and a dish of pancakes, half a foot high. A horn-blower stood under the half deck, just before the cabin door, playing on his instrument all the time we were at dinner. His notes were most incongruous, and some of his blasts almost ridiculous; but our unsophisticated host often praised the music, declaring "he was the best horn in the fleet." In the course of conversation, Captain Limeburner proposed sailing the next day; saying, "the fellows had now plenty of fresh grub, and he must see what the Dons were about on the main." I, however, succeeded in persuading him to remain till Monday, and attend on divine service to-morrow with his officers and crew. "Man does not live by bread alone," observed Mr. Rowley, opportunely, "but by every word that proceedeth from the mouth of God."—"I approve of that," replied Captain Limeburner: "although a sailor, I hope I am not quite a Turk, though they say I am a bit of a Tartar." This remark drew a smile from his officers; the allusion seemed not to be lost on them; and it could not but bring to my mind his reply to honest Craig—Who the devil are you, to prevent me flogging my marines, if I like it?"

On Sunday we were much crowded, even under the canopy of the great tree; but it was a most gracious sight to my dear wife and myself—so large a congregation: namely, our now numerous people, and all the frigate's crew, assembled to worship on the very same spot where, in time past, she and I alone, with our dear little dog at our feet, lay waiting patiently on that gracious God, who had not only answered our prayers in mercy to ourselves, when we alone were the inhabitants of the island, but who had now almost miraculously raised in this spot a consecrated temple to himself, and brought to it even a multitude of grateful worshippers. "I am like Jacob," said I, "who had crossed Jordan with his scrip and staff only; and, behold, he returned over it at the head of two bands!” A celestial tear stood in my sweet wife’s eye, when I said this to her; and I thought Rachel, the beloved of the patriarch, must have looked like her.

Early on Monday morning, half-a-dozen sheep, a few turtle, some poultry, and a large supply of vegetables, were sent on board the frigate with my compliments. The boat brought back the thanks of Captain Limeburner and his officers, with a present of two casks of vinegar,—an article we much wanted. The Porghee was getting in readiness to sail out of the harbour with the frigate, while Drake was at the mansion receiving his instructions how to proceed as to the business to be done at the Mosquito shore with respect to the settlement making at the Island of Rattan. After finishing what I had to say to him relative to his public duty, I desired him to procure three stone-masons; as I saw clearly that the village must be extended, and a church built for the accommodation of our increasing population. As soon as the sea-breeze set in, the two vessels weighed, and stood out to sea.

During Drake’s absence, about one-third of the woodland region was cut down for the site of the new buildings; a street being marked out in a continuous line from that already built, but intersected at right angles by a broader street, opposite to the anchorage, and running back nearly to the face of the hill. At this upper extremity it was intended to place the church: and at the crossing of the streets, in the square of their intersection, a fountain was to be made by means of a leaden pipe leading from the spring at its source. Drake brought the masons on his return, and gave a flaming account of what was doing at Rattan. There were engineers, and a battalion of King’s troops, and plenty of government money, but they were in want of almost every necessary. Van Kempen pricked up his ears at this information, and lost no time in sending off two vessels with supplies; some part of which, was our own island produce, and manufacture, even to brown pans and dishes, made by the Germans, which now they had learned to glaze, by throwing salt into the kiln before they took out the ware. The masons, and bricklayer, and carpenters, and a suitable number of labourers, were quickly set to work upon the church; a plain building, with a turret, for only one bell.

By one of our vessels from Jamaica, in October, I received a gracious letter from my friend Lord Harrington, in which he told me the King had raised Sir Robert Walpole to the peerage; and had given himself also a step or two in the same way. But he added, whatever situation he might fill, he hoped I would ever count on his services on all occasions. I read the letter after dinner to my domestic friends; and then laying it down for a moment, observed, that "Lady Seaward would have been burned for a witch, seven years ago."—"How so, Edward?" she exclaimed.—"On a memorable occasion, my love," said I, "you predicted that the King would dismiss Sir Robert Walpole with either a fool's cap or a coronet."—"May a good spirit now guide him!" she replied. "I forgive him; but his country and posterity, I fear, will not. History seeks justice, without mercy." At this remark, Mr. Rowley shrugged up his shoulders; and while I folded up the letter, and put it in my pocket, I proposed the health of my noble friend, by his new titles of Viscount Petersham, Earl of Harrington. Here this short conversation ended, soon turning to the ever-interesting subject of our own settlement.

CHAPTER XIV.

ON Tuesday, the 7th of December, early in the morning, the look-out at the flag-staff on the promontory reported several large ships in sight, but could not make out what they were: he hoisted our colours, and then came down. I immediately sent for Drake, but lost not a moment myself in hastening to the height, to reconnoitre them. In about half an hour I made two of them out to be large frigates, and three others armed brigs: they were then becalmed. I was observing them attentively with the glass, when Drake arrived; and at that instant I saw an English ensign blow out from the mizen peak of one of them, the first of the sea breeze having just reached her. "O, they are English," said I, giving Drake the glass. He had scarcely put it to his eye, when he exclaimed, "All Spanish! Sir Edward."—"Not so!" I replied; "are you sure of that?" He took another look at them. "The sooner we are at quarters," he cried, "the better; they are all Spanish men-of-war." Van Kempen had joined us just as Drake spoke. "Let them fire the big gon then," he said. I desired that the gun should not be fired without my orders; and instantly proceeded to descend, taking Drake and Van Kempen along with me. "They certainly meditate an attack on us," said Drake, as we turned away from the flag-staff.—"And it is my business," I replied, "to give them a warm reception."—"Allow me, then," he rejoined, "to go out with the Porghee, and reconnoitre." I made him no reply; but stopping for a moment, called for Price, the fifer, and bade him run down before us, and say I desired the bugle to be sounded to assemble; and then return to the signal-post, to bring messages from thence to the mansion. I then addressed Drake: "I shall lose no time in making my dispositions; but I do not think I will allow you to stir from the harbour."

After this, not a word was spoken during our return. A thousand things to be done, and which should have been already done, crowded into my mind. I had but just time to give them anything like an arrangement, before I sat down in my own hall. In a minute I was on my legs again, strong in a feeling of collectedness for the occasion.—"Captain Drake," said I, "let the Porghee be towed round, and moored athwart the mouth of the cove, under the precipice on the east side of the isthmus, ready to slip, if necessary. Let the merchant vessels be immediately run close up into Peccary Creek. The Avon, and boats, to be kept ready for any service that may be required." He went to put the orders into execution, not making any remonstrance or reply, beyond saying, "It shall be done."—"Mr. Van Kempen, I charge you to get some water-tight casks up to the promontory, and employ people, and asses, to carry up water to fill them; and convey provisions to the same place, in sufficient quantity, lest we should be driven to make a stand there, with all our women, and their children." He began to talk. "Take example from Captain Drake," I said, hastily, "and do you, as you are desired!"—"I will make the women carry," he replied. "Do so, if you please," I bawled out, with some vehemence; "only let it be done, and that speedily. Craig," said I, lowering my voice as I spoke to him, who at the time was standing very near to me, "I believe we shall have to fight; see that every thing is ready for the small-arm men; sixty rounds in their cartouch boxes, with a spare flint. And take care to deposit kegs of ball cartridges in such places as you think may be safe and right, in case of being hard pressed by the enemy, should he land. I intend thirty of our men to be detached to Sugar-Loaf Hill, besides twenty sailors to the battery. Send appointments there for that number, with three kegs of ball cartridges, and some spare flints: and have the accoutrements for all the rest, arranged under the sheds at Fort George. But there is so much to do, the men cannot be allowed to fall in till the last moment."

By this time the people had collected; among whom was the sergeant of artillery from Fort Vernon, and one of the artillery-men from Pirates' Fort. But we had been guilty of great negligence: there were no cartridges filled for the Spanish guns. The artillery-men at hand were immediately sent to the magazine; from whence ten barrels of gunpowder, and a bale of paper and woollen cartridges, and some slow match, were taken, and conveyed to Fort Vernon. And I was glad to get this ammunition over, even unfilled; for I expected every moment, now the sea breeze was freshening, to see Price come down from the height with the intelligence that the Spanish squadron was crowding sail for the port; but as yet he did not make his appearance. Two barrels of gunpowder, and cartridges, were quickly sent to Pirates' Fort, by the canoe that brought the artillery-man, at the blowing of the bugle; and the same quantity was now got up to the promontory; also a supply of filled cartridges, brought to Fort George. Every boat was in requisition, everybody was employed.

My brother and the Doctor waited for orders. I took my brother aside: "James," said I, "go home immediately, and let your wife and children be removed to German Town, with all your money. And remember, in case of an attack, it is my wish that they, and all the German women, take refuge on the height where the flag-staff is. But when they are there, take care that no person hoists the colours; for by so doing, the place of their refuge would be shown. Meanwhile, order the women to take water and provisions to the height; and you return to me as soon as you can.”—“ I don’t like this business, brother,” he replied; “ but at any rate I think it right to place the women in safety; and I will see to it immediately.”—“ Doctor Gordon,” said I, “ let your wife accompany Mrs. Seaward to the height above German Town, to be out of the way. I fear there will be work to-day for you.”—“ In that case,” he replied, “ I can’t spare my wife; she must come to the hospital.” But his wife thought otherwise, and went off with the rest of the women on that side of the settlement, to the height above German Town.

Ten o’clock had arrived without any decided report from the flag-staff. I sent up Orderly-Corporal M’Nabb, to try his sagacity; he returned, saying, “ that all the vessels were laying to, except one of the brigs, which he supposed was seeking to find the channel; but she was looking for it off the Turtle Islands.” Drake now rejoined me; having stationed the Porghee across the cove, our haven of safety not to be forgotten. Having done this, he had only to walk across the isthmus, and come through the village and woodland region, to reach the mansion. I told him my arrangements in a few words, and desired him now to go with all speed to Spring Hill, for Mrs. Drake and the dear children; and to send all the women and children from Allwood’s Bay, to take refuge “ on your head, my dear friend!” said I, “ on Drake’s Head: you know we must now call everybody and everything by their proper names.” I spoke this with relaxed features; for I wished that he should feel, as I had been a little austere in the line of duty, that we were nevertheless the same dear and familiar friends. "They will be safe enough at Spring Hill, Sir Edward," he replied. —"They may not, sir," was my answer, rather sternly; "if the Spaniards do attack us in right earnest, they will put out all their strength against Fort Vernon, and the hill that commands it. Let me see your family here, directly." Drake smiled, and bowed, and went off; and within an hour returned with his precious charge, in my barge; and all the other women and children for Allwood's Bay, in the Avon.

Our people were every one in motion; like ants, whose hill had been suddenly invaded by the rude kick of some country clown, or wicked schoolboy. Some were going, some were coming, some laden, some empty. The Avon was now despatched to Fort Vernon, with a detachment of twenty seamen (the merchant vessels being all safe in Peccary Creek), to reinforce the artillery corps stationed there. And thirty of the train-band were sent to defend Sugar-Loaf Hill. At the same time a boat was sent to Pirates' Fort, with six sailors, carrying along with them provisions, and small arms for themselves, and for the artillery-men and negro boatman that belonged to the fort. This boat brought over all the women from the settlement at Pirates' Land; their husbands, our late emancipated negroes, having already come to us on the sounding of the bugle. I deputed Corporal Andrews and Lance-Corporal Finlayson to go with the detachments to Spring Hill; and offered my brother the command. But he said he did not think himself equal to it; and thought I should give it to Captain Drake. "I cannot spare him," I replied. Then instantly taking hold of a piece of paper, I wrote a commission for Craig, styling him Lieutenant James Craig, and appointing him to the command of Edward's Island, and of all the forts thereon, pro tempore; also commanding every person to obey him in all things, etc. "Here, Craig," said I, "go and take the command of Fort Vernon, and defend Sugar-Loaf Hill to the last. Here is your commission." — "I thank your Honour," he replied; "I hope I shall do my duty." He then added, "Have you any further orders?" — "Go to your post," I replied, "and see that there is a supply of water, and provisions at the fort. Also be careful of the boats and canoes; keep them snug behind the rock, under the fort, for communicating with me, or for any other service that may be required." Craig took his leave; and as on his arrival at Sugar-Loaf Hill the dispositions would be completed, my anxiety for our safety now became much lessened. For if the enemy had pushed in with the first of the sea breeze, Fort Vernon, and every other place after it, must have fallen in half an hour: we were not prepared, and, to my shame I confess it, from sheer negligence. How many places and ships have fallen an easy prey to an enterprising enemy, from the same cause, though, perhaps, for ever concealed from the public eye or ear!

"I cannot spare you, Drake," said I, addressing myself to him, as Craig left the hall; "all your own seamen are with us. I have sent none but the crews of our merchant vessels, to assist the artillery-men at Fort Vernon and Pirates' Fort. You must take charge of Fort George here, with the Porghee's crew: you will then be ready to embark in the Avon, or go round to your own vessel; either of which you can do in twenty minutes; or act here, as circumstances may require." One of my old artillery-men remained on the promontory: the other two were in attendance at Fort George.

While all this was going forward, my dear Eliza walked to and fro with much earnestness, but great composure; evidently engaged in giving directions to people without, at the back of the mansion. She never spoke to me, from the moment I left her to go to the promontory early in the morning, till about ten o'clock, when she brought me a cup of coffee with her own hand. I then sat down; and as she gave it to me, she kissed my forehead, saying, "They may strike at the Dolphin to-day, but they shall not kill him. Mon Dieu et mon Roi, dear Edward, is your motto, and your defence." I looked up, and blessed her. She continued to walk to and fro without speaking, but catching every word I said; and doing her part, in the spirit of the instructions she heard me giving to the heads of different departments.

It was twelve o'clock. I sent Drake to the promontory to observe the enemy. Every man and every woman continued actively at work, accomplishing various arrangements. So I now sat quietly, for a few minutes, reconsidering all I had done, and contemplating what remained to do. At this moment Doctor Gordon came in, asking Miss Rosalie to give him some silk thread, and a bit of wax, which she did. He then very coolly sat down at the table opposite to me, and proceeded to double and wax the silk: and having done this, he took some curved needles from his pocket, and began threading them. Mr. Rowley, who stood by, inquired what he was about. "Just getting ready a few ligatures for amputations," he replied.—"What!" exclaimed our kind but faint-hearted minister, evidently not under the impression of ignorance, but of horror.—"A few ligatures, I tell you, sir; just to be in readiness, you see," answered the Doctor. My dear wife, who was passing while this dialogue took place, said, very quietly,—"Doctor Gordon, I think you might have spared us the anticipation of having our legs and arms cut off, by the exhibition of those ligatures, as you call them, on that table.”—“They are nothing but a little waxed thread, madam,” he replied; “they can do nobody any harm.” But he was not insensible of the rebuke he had received; for he wrapped up his ligatures, with their needles, in a piece of paper, and walked away, no doubt to the village, to put his hospital in order. For he was a conscientious man, though often getting into scrapes through what he considered “acting in strict conformity to his duty.”

Drake soon returned from the promontory, saying, that two of the brigs were now off the Turtle Islands; and, he thought, with the intention of landing troops, and making a diversion. For they appeared full of men, and had several boats towing astern. The two frigates, he said, continued to lay-to in the fair way between the reefs, with the channel open; the other brig being a little within them, but out of shot. “I think, Sir Edward,” added he, “now that you have finished your dispositions, the height is your proper station; from whence you can see every thing, and send people down with orders, from time to time, as you judge necessary. And, if I may be allowed to give an opinion, I think the Porghee and Avon should run up within the reef, to prevent a landing by boats at Eastfield. The brigs cannot get in; the Turtle Islands are reef-bound, except for boats or small craft, so there is nothing to fear from the large vessels.”—“But if you beat up with the Porghee,” I replied, “it will show there is deep water between the reef and the land; which may be a hint to them to work in with the large vessels behind the promontory, and destroy you, and attack us from the isthmus, with their whole force by land.”—“They cannot work in, Sir Edward,” he replied; “the wind is right ahead, where there is any, and so baffling withal between the promontory and great rock off the cove, that any square-rigged vessel would certainly miss stays, and fall out again to leeward."—"Very well, then," I said, "take your old crew, Martin, Purdy, and four others; and also the ten pirates, if you think them trustworthy; you once said they were fine fellows; and with these people, man the Avon. She has pateras and musketoons already mounted: send her round immediately, and have muskets and cutlasses ready for the men, when they get to the cove, where the Porghee lies. By the time they arrive, you will be under sail; and be sure to take your own boats with you, lest you should be becalmed and want them." This matter being settled, Drake manned the Avon as I had proposed, and marched off with all his own men across the isthmus, to his vessel: thus taking with him on his expedition forty-six men.

It was now nearly two o'clock. All the carrying that remained to be done, could easily be effected by the negro women: therefore the train-band fell in on the open ground. We mustered sixty-eight rank and file, after having sent off the detachment to Fort Vernon. From this body I picked out thirty-eight, best calculated to work the great guns at Fort George, and placed them under the direction of the artillery-men. My brother was now ordered to march the remaining thirty, round by the woodland region, and take post within the stoccado of the cave storehouses, with the two field-pieces in his front, ready to act as might be required.

Mr. and Mrs. Rowley, with Mrs. Drake and their children, and Rosalie, and poor old Rota, had been sent forward to the height. My dear Eliza alone remained with me, if I may except faithful Master Diego and Fidele. Nothing more was left to do here, but to return

God thanks, that these Spaniards did not pounce upon us, and destroy us at once, as they might have done. I helped my guardian angel on her mule; I then mounted the other; and taking our way to the fort, I encouraged the men as we passed along, telling them my post was at the height to observe the enemy; but if my presence should be required with them, or at any other point, I would soon be down. They gave me three cheers; and I then proceeded as fast as the mule would carry me, accompanied by my beloved wife, and our early and much-loved friends and companions, honest Diego and faithful Fidele. "God will not forsake you, my honoured and dear husband, in this day of trial," said my dear Eliza as we passed on: "I am proud," continued she, "to see you so collected and assured; it delighted my heart all this morning, to hear you give your orders."—"Thank you, my sweet comforter," I replied; but I said no more, for my mind was full of our present portentous situation.

Just as we came to the brow of the summit, I heard a gun, the first that had been fired to-day. I hastened to alight. It was from one of the Spanish frigates, without shot; that vessel hoisting at the same time a union-jack at the main-top-gallant-mast-head,—our signal for a pilot. They, perhaps, had just determined on the stratagem, but it was hoisted at the wrong mast-head; and, therefore, if anything were wanting to confirm Drake's opinion, we now had it. No notice was taken of this signal. The frigates were now standing in; I kept my eye on them with the glass, desiring the artillery-man, as soon as they came within shot, to make the fifer sound the bugle three times, (a signal I had agreed on with the officers below, for the serious approach of the enemy,) and then to give him a shot from time to time as opportunity might serve, but not to fire without good aim. Saying this, I mounted the mule again; and with Eliza by my side, and Diego at our heels, rode a little way to get sight of the Porghee and Avon, which I soon perceived stretching up between the isthmus and the reef. There were signals flying at the mast-heads of the two brigs, and boats full of men trying to get in, round the reef, close to the Turtle Islands; just the place where we were shipwrecked, nine years ago. From the spot where I halted, I could see all the Spanish squadron, but I was most intent on the operations to the northward. The two frigates and brig had again hove to, with main-top sails to the mast, distant about three miles east of the promontory, just clear of the southernmost point of the inner reefs. But it appeared to me that they knew their way in, and that they were only waiting the landing to be effected, and the consequent junction of the other two brigs.

In a little time I perceived the boats with the troops, endeavouring to get back to the brigs, on seeing the approach of our vessels. But some of them were too far advanced, to succeed against the surf. The Porghee soon got her bow guns to bear upon three of the boats, and in five minutes after, both she and the Avon with her pattereras and musquetoons were firing briskly. The Spanish boats returned the fire with musketry, but their shot could not reach our vessels. One of the boats was quickly sunk. The brigs now hoisted their proper colours, and fired; but their shot fell short. Something at this moment decided the Spanish Commodore. He hoisted the Spanish flag, and hauled down the English colours, before flying as a ruse de guerre; filled his main-topsail; and stood in for the harbour, with the other frigate and brig in his wake. When I saw this, I hastened to the flag-staff. By the time I got there, the Spanish squadron was within long range of our gun. The bugle then sounded three times, and in about a minute after, the artillery-man gave the enemy a shot. It was well hove and strong, passing over their mast-heads. "Less powder and better aim next time, Robins," I cried, addressing myself to the artillery-man. He made no reply, but loaded again as fast as he could. I turned round the while with my glass. And it was a gracious, though awful sight to me, to look down upon the forts, and see all our men at quarters, and the artillery-men with lighted matches, ready to give the invaders a warm reception. Robins fired again, and, by good fortune almost unprecedented, struck the head of the foremast of the second frigate. Down came her top, with all above it, and all her head-sails. In an instant she came athwart the brig that was in her wake, and they lay foul of each other. Soon, however, the brig disentangled herself, the Commodore heaving to, the while. Robins tried to hit him, but could not succeed. The disabled frigate now drifted with the wind and current, round the bluff of Edward's Island (which placed her out of the way of our gun), and she there, as we afterwards learnt, let go an anchor.

The Commodore, notwithstanding this accident to his other frigate, entered the passage to the harbour in the most undaunted manner, supported only by the one brig. As yet he had nothing to fire at. Guns from the sea could not be elevated sufficiently to reach the promontory. But as soon as he got fairly within the passage, between the two islands, he and the brig commenced firing away from both sides, at anything and everything that presented itself. In a few minutes Fort Vernon opened upon him, when distant about three quarters of a mile; and soon after, the guns from Fort George were brought to bear upon him. He now had to encounter the fire of both batteries. He did not close with either fort, but lay to, midway between them; firing both sides at long range, one at the one fort, the other side at the other. I thought he saw his error, but he did not seem to like to close with Fort Vernon: and Fort George being to windward of him, he could not reach it without making a tack; which was not very convenient in his present situation, being already a good deal cut up in his sails and rigging: however, I thought he intended to do so, for he soon hauled close to the wind, laying up for the cocoa-nut grove on the isthmus; still keeping up an irregular fire, but much slackened. I saw great confusion on his decks, whenever the smoke cleared away; but our fire continued steady; from which I augured well for the safety of our people. After being thus engaged about an hour, the brig stood away for the northern channel, the frigate following her; both a good deal damaged. As they came abreast of Pirates' Fort, the frigate received the contents of the two guns there, which the artillery-men very wisely had reserved. A trifling fire was returned, but they seemed not in a condition to keep it up; or perhaps, only intent on making their way out by the northern passage, they gave up the idea of more fighting. There certainly was some one on board who knew the island well; however, before they could get fairly out, the raking fire of the two guns followed them with sufficient execution to knock away a topmast from the frigate, and add otherwise materially to the damage they already had sustained.

I thought it was now all over; but I soon perceived that Sugar-Loaf Hill was attacked from the land side. It immediately occurred to me that the force came from the frigate, which had dropped anchor at the back of Edward's Island. The great gun on the platform was directing its fire to one point on Allwood's range, from whence I could see, by help of my glass, the Spaniards descending. "This is the consequence of cutting down the cedar trees on the other side of the range," thought I to myself; "at which time a footpath must have been made over it, that I am not aware of." I confess I was amazed and disconcerted. I called Price, and wrote an order in pencil for Captain Seaward to draw off a guard of seamen from Fort George, for the stoccado; and send off his thirty men of the train-band to Fort Vernon, without delay, in such boats as were at hand; and to direct them to take off their hats on landing upon Allwood's beach, and carry up as many large pebble stones in them as possible to the fort, and order the gunners to use them as grape shot against the assailants.

In ten minutes after Price was gone, Drake made his appearance at the flag-staff, covered with sweat and gunpowder. I had just time before his arrival to move from my position, and make a sweep with the glass, of the reef and Turtle Islands, when I saw the two Spanish brigs still there, but one of them on her beam ends, and the other at anchor outside of her, sending boats to and fro. I thanked God for this; but was uneasy, because I could not discover either of our vessels, and had just returned when Drake mounted the rising ground. "We have destroyed three of their boats, Sir Edward," said my gallant friend, "and have taken fifteen prisoners. One of the brigs is on her beam ends, and the other at anchor outside of her, trying to get her off, or save the crew. But where is the rest of the squadron?" continued he.—"Our brave fellows," I replied, "have beat the Commodore, and one brig, out of the bay. But there is a frigate, whose foremast Robins shot away at the second fire, now at anchor on the other side of the opposite bluff; and I suspect she has landed a great part of her crew; for they are at this moment attacking Sugar-Loaf Hill from the land side. Take the glass, and you will see the business.”—"I thought there was something the matter there, by the occasional cannonading," he observed, as he put the glass to his eye. "They appear to be in force on the range at this moment," he said, as he held the glass up to its object. "What is to be done, sir?"—"I have ordered them a reinforcement," I replied.—"If they take Sugar-Loaf-Hill," he exclaimed, "the place is lost! Allow me to run down on the frigate with my own crew, and all the sailor-men I can collect below from the fort and from the Avon; perhaps I may surprise the frigate, with most of her crew on shore, and capture her."—"The emergency of the case, my dear Drake," I replied, "induces me to accept your gallant but daring enterprise. Go; and God be with you!"

In forty minutes after he left me, I saw the Porghee, with her decks full of men, passing the promontory from the cove, into which he had run after destroying the brig's boats. I again turned my eyes anxiously to Sugar-Loaf Hill. Two of Fort Vernon's guns had now been brought to bear on the assailants; but there was a brisk fire of musketry on both sides. Our boats with the reinforcement were landing, and as yet there was no enemy near enough the beach to dispute the way to the entrance gate of the corkscrew road. I was glad to see all the empty boats coming back, in tow of my barge—including those which had been left in the boat harbour under the fort; and I began to hope the important post was safe; there being now ninety men there,—nearly double the number Frazer allowed me to defend it against a thousand. Robins thought he might help to frighten the Spaniards on the ridge, if he could do nothing else: he was sure he could reach the spot, where he saw a considerable body collected; and who, he said, no doubt, were making a platform to mount guns on. This suggestion I thought very probable: I therefore desired him to try a shot, though the distance was perhaps rather more than two miles. There was great difficulty in getting the gun round; but by the help of the negro women on the height, who were numerous and accustomed to labour, we effected it. Then giving it the greatest elevation, to ascertain its power, he threw a shot clear over the range. The angle was lessened until he struck the place just below where the Spaniards were at work; and he continued to fire every now and then, whenever a number collected together on the spot. I was surprised that the gun on Sugar-Loaf Hill had not already beat them from this position; but I learned afterwards, that the party we saw, were not seen from the other post, there being a screen of trees between them. The fire of our gun rather disconcerted them; at least we thought so, for they soon disappeared: but it was from a different cause. Drake had laid the frigate aboard, cleared her decks, and made the Captain his prisoner. The frigate's boats, and almost all the crew, were on shore; but the instant the attack on her, was discovered, the Spaniards that were in sight, or within hearing from the beach, crowded down to their boats, to go off to the assistance of their Captain and comrades. But the thing was done; and Drake knew too well what he was about, to allow any consideration, under heaven, to induce him to risk his object, viz. the preservation of Sugar-Loaf Hill, and consequently of the settlement. He therefore, after striking the frigate's colours, cut her cable, and allowed her to drift, taking with him the colours and the Captain on board the Porghee. Having thus disencumbered himself, he kept under sail, firing into the boats as they approached him, or endeavoured to gain the frigate. Drake had seventy men on board the Porghee; therefore had little fear of being boarded by the boats, the whole of which did not contain more than his number. There were five boats, of which he sunk two, one cried for quarter and had it, one made its way alongside of the frigate, the other returned to the shore. The frigate was drifting fast upon the reef; and as Drake knew a boat's crew could not prevent her doing so, he left her for the present to her fate, and proceeded to cannonade the boat and people returned to the beach, who were now joined by several others from the ridge. For a while they replied to his fire with musketry; but laid down their arms when they saw their Captain a prisoner, who was made to stand up in the rigging for that purpose.

A midshipman was now sent on shore from the Porghee, who received the arms of the Spaniards into his boat; then making the prisoners, to the number of forty, get into the Spanish long-boat (which was the boat that returned to the shore), he took her in tow, and rowing off, received a rope from the schooner. Drake now very wisely proceeded on his return, with the two boats in tow; leaving the frigate to her fate. Before I knew what had taken place at the back of Edward's Island, I perceived the fire of the assailants slacken, and ultimately cease; which was immediately followed up by a flag of truce, displayed on Allwood's ridge. It was an officer's shirt, tied by the sleeves to a pole. On seeing this, I sent Price, as fast as he could run, to the further extremity of the promontory, to call down to Captain Seaward (who was posted below, within the cave-avenue stoccado with fourteen seamen, the remnant of our force here), to man my barge, and also the Avon, and despatch them immediately to Fort Vernon. This result of the contest, was most grateful to my feelings; for my anxiety had been more than I chose to express.

The sun was going down, as my gallant friend, with his prisoners in tow, appeared round the opposite headland; and I now thought I might with safety allow the people to descend. I gave my beloved Eliza my arm, our hearts being lifted up to God for this wonderful deliverance from a powerful enemy; and we left the height, followed by Master Diego (leading the two mules), and by all our household. Our first inquiry to the artillery-men, on our return, was for the wounded. There were none as yet reported. No one at Fort George had been touched; but some of the Spaniards taken in the boats by Drake in the morning, were in hospital with Doctor Gordon; where good dear Mr. Rowley was now rendering every assistance in his power, notwithstanding his timidity and natural horror even of the idea of wounds and bloodshed. The mansion, however, and all the out-houses, and the sheds at the horns of the fort, were marked, and in some places much damaged, by the shot that passed over the curtain of the battery.

I was scarcely seated, when Drake came on shore with a sailor close at his heels, carrying a huge bundle on his back. As the hero advanced to the mansion, his wife ran out to embrace him; he clasped her in his arms tenderly, and then coming up to me by a sort of leap, exclaimed,—“We have done it, Sir Edward! I have nabbed the Captain of the frigate, Don Pugnacio,—no, Ignacio, something, de Herrera: he’ll tell you his name by-and-by: he is our prisoner; there is his sword, and there are his colours;” turning his eye upon the honest tar, who bore them on his shoulders. “Heave them down, Jack!” said he; “and I hope she lies broadside on the reef by this time." Then resuming his discourse to me—"As soon as we cleared her decks of the some fifty or sixty men that opposed us, I cut her cable and sent her adrift."—"You should have preserved the vessel, if you could, my dear Drake," I replied; "she would have made you a full Captain."—"That crossed my mind, Sir Edward, when I ordered her to be cut adrift; but I would not risk a chance of miscarrying in the service I was sent upon, for that or any other consideration. If I had attempted to keep possession of the frigate, I might have failed in what I have accomplished, and perhaps been taken myself."—"You have done well, my gallant friend," was my reply: "I honour you not only for your bravery, but for the nobleness of mind you have displayed on the occasion." My dear wife at this moment stretched out her hand to him, saying—"Shake hands with me, my excellent friend. How happy is my Edward in being so nobly supported!"

In the midst of these greetings, the sergeant of artillery arrived from Lieutenant Craig, with a convention of capitulation, signed with El Teniente de Fregata, Don Juan Quesada; by which seventy-eight men had laid down their arms, on condition that they might be allowed to return to Spain or Spanish America,—“and not serve again until exchanged,” was very properly added by Craig. The arms were taken into the fort; the prisoners placed in two of the houses at Allwood's Bay; while a third was allotted to the wounded, who were fast bringing in, two Spanish surgeons being in attendance; sentinels were planted, and a guard placed in an adjoining house. The sergeant of artillery, moreover, informed me, our reinforcement had arrived but just in time; for that two guns had been got up nearly to the top of the ridge, by the Spaniards; that many of the Spaniards were regular soldiers, or marines; and that, as far as he could learn, the number of killed and wounded must at least equal that of the prisoners. "Indeed, we soon saw," continued he, "the Spanish surgeons have their hands full." But God had been merciful to us; there was not a man of ours killed at Fort Vernon, nor on the hill, and only three slightly wounded by musketry. "The Spanish vessels," he said, "fired so badly, that not even the fort was hit, but several shot struck the houses in the bay." I now counter-signed the convention; then taking the artillery sergeant aside, I whispered in his ear the parole and countersign for the night, desiring him to communicate them privately to the commanding officer at Edward's Island. Having done this, I put the ratified paper into his hands, desiring him to give it to Lieutenant Craig, with my thanks not only to himself, but to the men under his command, for their steady defence of the post intrusted to them. I then desired that our wounded, might be sent over immediately; and as there was no longer occasion for so large a force at Edward's Island, I requested that fifty of the train-band might return to me in the Avon. "You may tell Don Juan Quesada," said Drake to the sergeant of artillery, as he was about to depart, "that I have got his friend, Captain Don Ignacio, snug enough."—"I am glad to hear that, sir," replied the sergeant; "he was likely to give us some trouble."—"But here is his Donship's sword, Sir Edward," said Drake, stooping and taking it up from among the colours, where the sailor had thrown them: "I should have presented it to you in form, when I first came in, but somehow it slipped my memory at the moment." I received it from his hand, with a feeling of some exultation, but it was that I might return it to him again.—"Let him that won it, wear it, my brave fellow," I exclaimed: "you are worthy not only of his sword, but his frigate."

As soon as the detachment arrived from the other side, the prisoners were landed from the Spanish ship's long-boat, and marched up with a guard to the stoccadoed recess; where the other prisoners already were, with no other sentinels than my brother, Van Kempen, and two artillery-men. But the Spanish Captain was detained on board the Porghee, for the present, by my order; as I did not wish him to see the hurly-burly condition to which he and his comrades in arms had thrown us.

It was now thought right, although it was no longer daylight, to reconnoitre not only the frigate, but the brigs. Honest Diego, who stood by me, and who never had been five yards from me all day, volunteered to go with his men in the barge, to carry Captain Drake round to the back of Edward's Island, to ease the white sailors a little, who had had no rest since morning. Diego's proposal was immediately accepted; and he was told to send Martin or Purdy here, or both if he could find them. While Diego was gone to get his crew together, poor Drake took some refreshment, the first he had put within his lips this day; yet he found time to speak between his mouthfuls.—“I told you those pirates were fine fellows, Sir Edward,” said he: “my eye! how they laid about them when we boarded the frigate. I popt upon him round the headland, and was athwart his star-board bow before he saw us. I don't know how many of his crew my fellows drove overboard; however, the decks were soon cleared one way or other; but three of the pirates were killed, and two of my own brave men also; and I have ordered seven more of them, who are wounded, to be sent on shore to the hospital.” As he said this, he took a glass of wine somewhat hastily, jumping up at the same time from his chair, and wiping his eye with the back of his hand, to brush away a tear that had sprung forth in spite of him.—“But they only did their duty,” said he, “to die for their country.” He then sat down again, saying, “I am done,” and pushed aside his plate. I endeavoured, and we all endeavoured, to conceal our emotions, but some vainly: the feeling he had evinced was too powerful, not to carry along with it the sympathy of all present.—“Come, my dear fellow,” said I, striving to put aside what I felt, let us fill another glass of wine, and drink the King’s health, and the health of all his brave men-at-arms.” As we filled our wine, Diego returned with Martin and Purdy, telling Captain Drake that the barge was ready.—“Go you,” said I, addressing myself to the two Bermudians, “in a canoe to the Turtle Islands, and bring me word what the two Spanish brigs are about. Look narrowly at the one on the reef, but have a care you are not taken.”—“Can’t catch canoe, sir,” replied Purdy, laughing, and looking, perhaps, like Master Diego’s black cat. Drake caught a little of Purdy’s happy humour, his native spirits returned, and he laughed too. I desired him to give each of the men a glass of grog, which he did, and they all walked down to the beach together.

There was no sleep for many of us, this night. I sent for my brother, gave him the parole and countersign, and disposed of the guard. I then sent for Van Kempen, and requested him to victual the prisoners, and keep an account of the issues. The women were engaged in bringing back things from the promontory, and neither man, woman, nor child were idle; all happy to be so employed. Between two and three o’clock in the morning, Drake returned from visiting the frigate. He found her aground on the inner edge of the reef. Diego hailed her in Spanish, and spoke to the men on board, before he carried Captain Drake alongside. He told them, all their companions, as well as captain, were prisoners, and that he would advise them to surrender quietly on the same terms as the others had done; but if they refused, every man would be put to the sword. An officer answered from the deck of the frigate, "I surrender on the terms granted to our companions, now your prisoners." The barge was instantly rowed up to the side of the frigate, and no time lost in getting the remainder of the crew, and the wounded men (who had fought with the boarding party) into her, and into the Spanish boat, that had made good their ship after that rencounter. There were eleven wounded men, and only twenty-two others, a great part of these latter having belonged to the boat that reached the frigate after her capture; so that almost the whole body that had defended her when the Captain was taken, were either killed or driven overboard in the contest. The two boats being thus crammed full of men, pulled away as well as they could round the bluff, and made for Allwood's Bay, where the prisoners were delivered to the guard, and the wounded to the Spanish surgeons. While they were conveying the wounded to the house appropriated for them, Drake took a walk by the bright star-light up to his own house to see how matters stood there, and found things in a sorry plight; for the enemy had taken post in his chateau, when attacking Sugar-Loaf Hill: the house, in consequence, was much damaged by our own shot; and, besides, the Spaniards made free with whatever came in their way.

Not one of our family had as yet retired from the hall, to take rest, when Drake returned. His recital was listened to by every one with interest; but my poor dear sister could not hear, without vexation, the account he gave of the condition in which he found their residence.

She, however, quickly consoled herself and him, by saying, "Well, I should be thankful to God, that I and the children were not there; and that the Almighty has preserved you, through the perils of this awful day."

We now endeavoured to persuade the ladies to go to bed, but they desired to be permitted to remain. "It is a beautiful night," said Mrs. Rowley, "so calm and cool; and I like to hear the sentinels calling out 'All's Well!' which is so delightful a sound, after the toil and peril of this anxious day." She had scarcely done speaking, when Purdy entered abruptly, out of breath, and all in flutter. I could only make out "Spanish officer, sir! Guard, sir!" Drake jumped up, and ran to the door:—"A file of men are marching some one up," he exclaimed; and presently Martin, and a Spanish naval lieutenant, made their appearance. The ladies now withdrew—Martin and Purdy fell back towards the door, where the guard stood while the officer entered. I rose to receive him. He said, "he had been sent by his Captain, Don Blasco del Camino, to inquire into the truth of the information he had received from our canoe, that one of the Spanish frigates was captured by us, and that the Commodore had made a retreat. Don Blasco wished to know this, to order his conduct accordingly; and he trusted I would receive his officer, as if he came with a flag of truce." I partly understood him; but I made Diego interpret, for fear of mistake. I then replied through the same medium, desiring Master Diego to tell him, "That what he heard was true." And to ask him, whether his captain entertained any hope of getting the brig off the reef. He replied, "he did not."—"Well then," said I, "would his vessel receive from us 157 Spanish prisoners, besides forty-five wounded?" He stared, at this question, which Diego repeated twice.

"Valame Dios!" he exclaimed, "is this possible?" Drake had left Captain Ignacio's sword upon the table, and the Spanish colours were lying on the floor. Diego, pointing to them, said "Mira Señor Capitan!" On which he raised his hands, and seemed much affected, stepping aside, evidently to avoid treading on the Spanish flag. I liked him for this, and desired him to be seated; at the same time ordering some wine and refreshment. While he took it, I inquired of him how he got into the canoe. He said, "They saw it from the brig, approach the wreck; and made a man who spoke English, call to it, and say they wanted to send a letter to the Governor of the island; and if the canoe would wait and take the letter, no harm should happen to it." The people in the canoe, replied, "Then send only two men in the boat, and we will wait."—"Well done, my old shipmates!" exclaimed Drake. After this account, I put my question to him again, about receiving the wounded men and prisoners. He said, "It was impossible, his vessel being already too full, having all the people that belonged to the other brig, on board, excepting what had been sunk in the boats, and taken in the affair of the morning."—"Well, then, sir," I replied, "go back to your ship, and tell your Captain, Don Blasco del Camino, to make sail as soon as possible, with all the men he has on board, and land them either at Saint Andreas, or elsewhere near; and return with a flag of truce flying; he shall then have his countrymen, our prisoners; but it must be understood that he abandons the brig on the reef to me. If he agrees to this, let us see the white flag at your mast-head early to-morrow morning, which I shall acknowledge by hoisting a white flag also. I would send you back, sir," continued I, "in a large boat; but nothing larger than a canoe could take you with safety through the reefs," He wished to see Capitan Don Ignacio Pasqual de Herera. I told him "that was inadmissible: Don Ignacio was my prisoner, and could have no voice in the business." Here ended the conference. I then gave directions that Martin and Purdy should return him to his ship; adding my expectation, that they would act with the same caution in delivering him, as they had done in receiving him.

As the Spaniard stood up to withdraw, he said, with much feeling, "I believe there is a young officer, a son of Don Blasco del Camino, among the prisoners taken this morning; it would be gracious in your Excellency to give me the pleasure of taking him back with me to his father."—"Certainly," I replied; "you are a fine fellow; you have won my respect." When Diego interpreted this, the Spaniard, with the warm manner of his climate, bent forward and kissed my hand. Tired as my dear friend Drake was, he would not lose the opportunity of participating in this gracious act, as the Spanish lieutenant very properly had designated it; so he walked down with him, escorted by the corporal's guard, to the place where we had deposited our prisoners, and brought the lad forth and delivered him to his friend. Their meeting was affecting and impassioned: the youth was overjoyed at his unexpected freedom, and the immediate prospect of being restored to his father.

At daylight in the morning, just as the réveille beat, a large table-cloth was sent off to the promontory, to be bent on to the signal-halliards, in place of the ensign. At sun-rise we fired our gun. The Spanish brig then hoisted the flag of truce; and the moment it was perceived, ours went up also. As soon as the breeze reached her, she was seen under all sail, steering to the southward. Drake had thrown himself on the Spanish colours, soon after his return from delivering the youth to the lieutenant, and I was happy in seeing the poor fellow sleeping soundly. But we awoke at daylight, just as the drum beat, and dear old Rota brought in some coffee for our refreshment, of which he gladly partook; saying, "Now I am fresh as a lark—what's the order of the day, Sir Edward?"—"No rest for the wicked, Drake!" I replied jocosely; "I place every sailor-man in the settlement, excepting Diego and his crew, under your command. See if it be possible to get off the frigate."

Rota had called Mrs. Drake, and my dear wife, agreeable to their request. They came out in their dishabille, and joined us at our early breakfast. Very soon after their appearance, my brother came in. He was anxious to return to Peccary Field, and my dear Eliza and myself were equally anxious that he should do so, as it was probable Mrs. Seaward had not as yet descended from the heights. While James was refreshing himself with tea and coffee, I arranged with Drake that he should go on board the Porghee immediately, taking Diego as interpreter, and inform the Spanish captain, that in the course of half an hour a boat would be sent to remove him to the country-house of a gentleman on the island; where he was to remain while a prisoner with every indulgence, except going beyond its immediate grounds. I also desired Drake to say, that whatever private property he had on board the frigate, should be got at and conveyed to him. Drake now left us, to apprise Don Ignacio Pasqual de Herera of all this, and then to set about the more arduous task I had imposed on him. By the time my brother had quite finished breakfast, Diego returned from his first commission to the Porghee, and I now ordered him to see that his men were clean, and properly equipped to attend Captain Seaward back to her.

As soon as Master Diego left us, to get the crew of his boat ready, I told my brother my reasons for desiring him to take the Spanish captain to his house. "He could not remain on board the Porghee, while Drake was employed in recovering the frigate—I had no room for him at the mansion—there were plenty of spare rooms at Peccary Field House—besides, it was prudent to take him at some distance from the fortifications, and the prisoners, neither of which I wished him to see familiarly." James had made no objection when I first mentioned it; but I thought it right to show him my motive for sending this man to his house. My brother seemed satisfied; but said, he hoped I would allow three or four of his servants to quit military duty at the stoccado, and return to the house before him; for now there was not a man at Peccary Field; and if the women were not yet come from the heights, by the time he got home with the Spanish captain, there would be nobody there at all, and everything, of course, in disorder. "You shall have the men," said I; "send four of them off from the Black Rock in a canoe immediately; they will arrive at Peccary Field before you embark in the barge." He now left the mansion, and the ladies retired again to their rooms, my dear wife taking me by the arm, and leading me to her bedside, where she made me sit down. "Let me help you off with your coat, my Edward," she said, "and lay yourself down to take some rest, and your Eliza shall watch you as you sleep." I kissed the kind hand that helped me off with my coat, and laid me down on the mattress, wearied enough, in honest truth. She threw a sheet over me, and I soon fell asleep.

In about two hours I opened my eyes, met by the blissful smile of my guardian angel, who had sat by me all the time, watching every respiration, and enjoying the sight of her much loved husband sleeping safely, sweetly, and soundly, as she turned over in her mind the terrors, and anxieties of the preceding day. I arose, and took a bath, by which I was much refreshed. Every thing was again in place in the house: a regular though late breakfast was now laid, and all the female servants were in attendance.

Dr. Gordon came up, accompanied by Mr. Rowley, and gave us rather a satisfactory account of our wounded man. On the Doctor's return to the hospital, my dear wife sent a woman with him, carrying a bundle of old linen, and some tea and sugar, with a few other comforts, for the sick, which he had requested. Diego came back from landing my brother, and the Spanish captain, at Peccary Field; and he was now despatched to Allwood's Bay, at the suggestion of my kind Eliza, with a similar present of old linen, and some wine, for the wounded Spaniards, with directions to enquire of their surgeons what else they were in need of. He took over some of Mrs. Drake's women, but she chose to remain with us for the present.

A little before noon the Avon came from the frigate, with a note from Drake to me, in which he said, "I send you seventy-three barrels of gunpowder; this will replenish our magazine; it is quite dry. I don't think she leaks; but I know you will say I have done well to secure the powder. I have laid out an anchor, ready to heave on, as soon as we have lightened her enough. Ask Van Kempen to send me his galliot, by return of the Avon; the one can tow the other." — "Well done, Drake!" thought I to myself; "but what am I to do with the powder? the avenue to the magazine, is full of prisoners."

The moment the gunpowder was landed, the Avon stood over to Peccary Creek, and returned, in tow of the galliot, on her way to rejoin Drake.

I mentioned to my Eliza the dilemma, in which the arrival of the gunpowder, placed me. — “March the prisoners to the cocoa-nut grove,” said she; “it will be a recreation to them, and they will be out of the way.” — “That will do,” I replied; and I forthwith sent my orderly to direct that all the prisoners within the stoccado, should be marched under a sergeant’s guard to the cocoa-nut grove for the day, their dinner to be sent round in a canoe; and they were to be allowed to eat of the cocoanuts, and otherwise amuse themselves, but not to break the trees. This was done; the powder the while being placed in the magazine, and the avenue cleaned out, and some fresh sand thrown into it, all before the party returned.

Van Kempen came to me, after sending rations to the prisoners, and some supplies to Fort Vernon. He said he was sorry to inform me that no mullet had been taken the preceding night, and that the fish-pots were not sufficiently numerous to collect any quantity of other fish worth naming. The fact was, the mullet had gradually forsaken the Black Rock, and now they were gone entirely. I wished it had been the rats, he was speaking of. I told him I would order more fish-pots to be made immediately; and for the present he must serve turtle and hog’s flesh, chocolate-nuts, and Indian-corn flour, to the prisoners; and that I intended, without loss of time, to bring all those now at Allwood’s Bay, over to the isthmus, and place them with the rest, within the stoccado. Diego and his men were now sent to Peccary Creek, for the Jack Martin, which I despatched to Allwood’s Bay, with a note to Lieutenant Craig, desiring him to send all the prisoners, excepting the officers and wounded men, over to the isthmus; also to return himself with our people, leaving the settlers belonging to the bay, with their arms, now to take care of themselves; and to place the Fort, and Hill, again in charge of the sergeant of artillery, and his men; leaving orders to plant an artillery sentinel at the door of the house where the Spanish officers were, and to keep a good look-out. About five o'clock Craig arrived with his detachment, and ninety-nine prisoners, who were marched up to the stoccado, just as the others were coming back from the cocoa-nut grove. The whole number being now mustered, amounted to one hundred and fifty-four; not many less than our whole population put together, including the sailors belonging to the Porghee and other vessels. But extraordinary as it may seem, it is a fact, that the enemy lost more than this number in killed, drowned, and wounded. I think when we were attacked, our force was thirteen artillery-men; train band, ninety-eight; Porghee's crew, King's sailors, thirty; crews of the merchant vessels, including the ten pirates, forty-five, exclusive of officers;—total, one hundred and eighty-six.

When Craig had disposed of his prisoners, he waited on me. We talked over a little the trying business of yesterday, and I then desired him to put half the train-band on duty, day and day about, until we got rid of the Spaniards. Then, after thanking him for his gallant conduct, I told him he should retain his commission as lieutenant, with the addition of that of adjutant of the island force, also remain town-major; and that I hoped I should be able to raise his pay equal to his new rank. He expressed his gratitude, and went away to perform the duties of his office.

A little after sunset I received a note from Drake, written in pencil, to say, he could not return to-night; that he meant to work, watch and watch, in lightening the frigate, and that he hoped to heave her off the reef in the morning; that he understood there was a Panama pearl-diver among the prisoners, his name Vicente Guecco; that he wished I would find him out, and send him to the Porghee, as they could see the frigate's cable and anchor, where it had been cut away, lying in about five fathoms water; that he had in vain endeavoured to lay hold of it by grapnel, but he knew the pearl-diver could pass the bight of a rope round the end of the cable, in an instant, and recover it." In consequence I sent Diego to the stoccado, who soon found the man. He stipulated for a small reward, and a permanent asylum with us; to which I agreed most willingly, and then sent him to Drake. He did the business adroitly, on the following morning, and received a piece of gold.

On Thursday forenoon the Avon arrived, with various matters from the frigate, bringing the satisfactory information of her being afloat, and that she did not leak; the Captain's trunks, or rather boxes, with some other things belonging to him and the officers, were among the things brought in the Avon, and immediately forwarded to their respective owners by Diego, who was desired to inquire whether any other articles of value belonging to them yet remained to be looked for. The galliot soon followed the Avon, pretty well filled with stores and provisions. The frigate being thus lightened, and all the water started, she was easily hove off. This being accomplished, the boats towed her to the spot where she lay at the time her cable was cut; the end of which, now recovered by the diver, was brought into the hawse hole, and the anchor weighed. That done, Drake had only to wait for some additional boats, to tow round the prize into the bay, which the opportune arrival of my barge and two others supplied. With these, and his own best boat, he took the proud Spaniard in tow, and a little before sunset brought him to an anchor off the woodland region.

"L'Invariado," her name, appeared half as big again as the Sea-Horse. She mounted thirty large guns, and, at the time of the attack, had on board three hundred men. Drake put his senior midshipman on board, with half his crew, ordering them to unbend the sails, and make a speedy and careful clearance of the wreck forward; so that every thing might be ready to have the damage repaired as soon as possible. We felt a temptation to hoist the English colours over the Spanish flag; but my gallant friend and I had but one paramount feeling on that occasion; which was, not to add to the chagrin of the Captain and other prisoners, by displaying the ensign of our triumph before them.

On the morrow Drake went to look at the brig, lying on the Turtle Island's reef; but it was his opinion that nothing could be done with her but break her up; so we determined to leave the wreck as it was, until after we should get rid of our prisoners.

Every thing being now pretty well to rights, excepting the damage done by the shot, I was no longer ashamed of our condition; so I thought in courtesy to invite Don Ignacio Pasqual de Herera to dine with me; and accordingly I fixed on the following day, Saturday,—giving Adjutant Craig orders to see the whole body of men well dressed and appointed.

The Spanish captain came agreeable to the invitation, and also two of his officers from the other side, whom I invited to meet him. Although he had no side-arms, and therefore was not entitled to a guard, I ordered him to be received with military honours, and showed him much attention at the mansion. I was glad to find he could speak French. He was, however, grave and reserved: his officers were more inclined to talk; but as they knew nothing beyond Spanish, little conversation could be kept up with them. We had an elegant dinner, and all our family were present, including the only hero that belongs to it, gallant Drake.

After dinner, the conversation turned on Porto Bello. Don Ignacio now became a little more communicative. He had heard how Don Francisco Martinez de Retzez had behaved to the English Captain, Knight, and to myself; desiring me to believe him when he assured me, that Spanish officers generally, and he among the number, blamed the Governor very much for that conduct. "But," said he, "that hidalgo is now tasting the sweets of a prison himself; having been disgraced, and sent to a dungeon, on his arrival in Old Spain, after surrendering the place to Vernon." My dear wife now asked him, how the Spaniards came to give the name of Porto Bello to that horrible place. "It means Bel Havre—does it not?" said Lady Seaward. "Oui, Madame," he replied, "as you English speak it, and write it; but we Spaniards call it Porto Velo,—that is, 'Havre Caché,' the Veiled Port." I was rather pleased to learn this from the mouth of a Spaniard, and therefore have noted it down in my journal. The Spanish Captain showed both good breeding and proper feeling during his visit, in never making any allusion to the events that had occurred here; and we were equally punctilious in avoiding the painful subject. He however spoke of the attack on Carthagea, by Vernon and Wentworth, saying, "It was madness to have attempted it;" and he thought they had acted wisely in abandoning Porto Velo and the Spanish Main altogether; and he added his belief, that by this time they had abandoned their design on Cuba also. Coffee and cigars were served soon after dinner, and at an early hour my Spanish guests took leave, and returned to their respective quarters.

On the following day, which was the Sabbath, I made a point of having as full an attendance at divine service as the nature of our present circumstances would admit. Our heavenly-minded pastor on this occasion returned thanks to Almighty God, in an appropriate prayer, for our great deliverance from a powerful enemy.

On Monday, the Spanish brig of war made her reappearance, with a white flag flying at the fore; on which I sent out a boat to pilot her into our harbour, —first, taking the precaution to man the batteries, and place the train-band under arms. An English ensign was hoisted on board the frigate; but I did not make a vain-glorious display of the Spanish colours under it. The prisoners and wounded were now embarked as quickly as possible, for whom I took a receipt, under the joint signatures of the two Spanish captains; by which they engaged, that the persons, named therein, should not serve against England during the present war, until exchanged. The brig being ready to put to sea, I ordered them a supply of fruit and vegetables; and we thus parted, as good friends as persons could well do who were national enemies.

CHAPTER XV.

THE final departure of the Spaniards was a matter of general congratulation; for although the events incident to their invasion furnished matter for proud exultation, yet they had left us something more to do than sit down in idleness, and fight the battles over again. On the very day the brig sailed out of the harbour, I made arrangements for the morrow. The people were then set to work, to repair, in various ways, and at different places, the damages sustained by shot, during the encounter with the enemy. We had plenty of hands and plenty of wood, and no lack of money. Drake had been the greatest sufferer, at his château; but he made light of it, saying, —“I can plaster it over with some of their own dollars.” The masons and other workmen now proceeded with the church, and Drake used all diligence to repair the damaged foremast of the frigate, hiring Derrick and Xavier to assist his own carpenter. I employed a large party of men with boats, to save what they could from the Spanish brig, still lying broadside on the reef. I hired them at regular wages, to be paid out of the proceeds, which were to be sold when the business was completed, for the benefit of the island treasury. The wreck, I believe, was my right, if I chose to make it so; but the frigate was Drake’s prize; and perhaps, according to the law of the case, none but they who boarded her and took her, could claim to share for the capture, as she was not taken under any battery, nor within sight of any. But Drake was already rich in money, and always so in spirit; he therefore wished the prize to go among the garrison generally; and handsomely furnished an argument against his own exclusive claim, by saying, "It was a shot from the promontory that disabled her; and he would therefore tell his crew that he thought every one should share." The result was, that the brave seamen made no demur; and the people were told, at the first muster-day, of the liberal conduct of Captain Drake and his men, respecting the prize. The train-band gave the gallant tars three cheers; and this cordial generosity was not without its happy consequences.

The month of December was too far advanced before the frigate could be got ready, to be safe for Drake to proceed with her to Jamaica: besides, he could not do it without borrowing all the merchant sailors of the colony; and my brother and Mr. Reynolds were anxious to despatch their two vessels to Kingston with Spanish goods. The Cedar schooner, which was built here, sailed remarkably fast; but the Tom Cod was a sort of dray-horse. I therefore begged of my brother not to send his vessel at present, but to allow the schooner to go alone, in which I meant to forward my despatches to the Governor, and to the Admiral, at Jamaica. "The schooner need not wait for my vessel," he replied; "they can each make the best of their way."—"O, very well brother," I rejoined, "let it be so; but when two are together, one may escape, should an enemy's vessel see them: if the Tom Cod be espied alone, she is gone for a certainty."—"I will take my chance," he said; so accordingly the vessels sailed.

My despatches detailed the action we had sustained, in which I gave great praise to all our people, but more especially to Drake, and the seamen, and to Craig; requesting promotion for Drake; and praying that the Governor would send me thirty regulars; and if a lieutenancy could be purchased for Mr. James Craig, who was now lieutenant and adjutant of the island force, I would pay for it, provided he might command the detachment; and I would give 25*l.* over the usual price, to the lieutenant who might be in command of the men, to resign in favour of Mr. Craig. I fully expected all I requested would be granted; and making sure in my own mind that there were officers always desirous of quitting the West Indies for England, I should have no difficulty in purchasing a commission for Craig, and, by the proposed measure, obtain for him the command of the detachment.

When the stormy season approached, all the vessels in port were laid up in safety within Peccary Creek, and Drake contrived to get the frigate in there also, mooring her head and stern to the shore and to the rock. We kept our Christmas as usual. The year finished without seeing either of our vessels return from Jamaica; and although the sky sometimes lowered, we were as yet without any visitation from the storm.

1743.—On Sunday, the 2nd of January, a storm of a different kind, and to us more terrible, threatened the settlement with immediate destruction. At noon several large ships were descried, not only from the promontory to the southward and westward, but also from the heights above German Town, to the northward of the island. As soon as the alarm was given, we were on the alert; Drake betaking himself to the promontory, and one of his officers to the German Town height; signals being agreed on. I issued some orders, and joined Drake with all possible speed. By the time I got up to the flag-staff, he had clearly made out three Spanish men-of-war of two decks, two frigates, and two brigs. There were others in the distance, no doubt with troops, we could not make out distinctly; but we saw enough,—and for a moment my heart sunk within me. I turned to Drake. "We will do our duty, Sir Edward," said my gallant friend, "and must leave the event to God." I turned to God. "We are in thy hand," I exclaimed, raising my whole soul to the throne of mercy; "Thou only now canst save us." My courage seeming to come again with this appeal, I hastened to return to the mansion, with a stout heart and collected mind, prepared to do my duty.

But He, in whose hands are life and death, cut the matter short. Before I could reach the mansion, the sky was darkened, the lightning glared, and the thunder pealed. Instead of cannon, the hurricane blew all round the compass; and I blessed God in the storm. Full of joy, buffeted, and wet, we entered my dwelling. Here my beloved wife, and our revered pastor, and all our friends, met us in awful expectation. As I entered the hall amidst the rain and the whirlwind, I lifted up my hands,—saying—"Our God has delivered us!"

We now had to barricade ourselves against the blessed tempest, leaving the enemy in the hands of Him who can break them as a reed, and scatter them like chaff. The storm raged, and the torrents poured down upon the earth and sea, with little intermission, for three days: on Thursday, the sky became clear at intervals, and the winds lulled. Wrecks were then discovered from the heights, in several directions; but no sail was to be seen on the face of the waters. When this report was brought to me, dear Mr. Rowley stood up, and exclaimed—"We may now indeed say with Queen Elizabeth, on a like memorable occasion, 'Afflavit Deus, et dissipantur!'"

The next day was appointed as a solemn fast to the Lord; which I hope was not only observed, but deeply felt by all his people, whom He had just delivered from an overwhelming force; which, according to human cal-culuation, had it attacked us, must have extirpated the whole colony. -

Our boats and canoes were sent out as soon as the weather would permit. Seven wrecks were soon discovered among the reefs and shoals that surround the islands; among which were two of the largest ships, but every soul had perished; spars, and casks, and dead bodies, continually floating ashore.

This was an awful event; but the contemplation of our own imminent peril, had they lived! kept down every strong feeling of pity for those that had perished: and I ventured to entertain a further consolation, that the fate of this expedition, which I now had no doubt had sailed promptly from Porto Bello, to revenge the cause of the former, would prevent any further attempt at our destruction. For the seasons there, are no guides as to the seasons here; generally speaking, they have bad weather on the Main, from July to October, which is our fine season. Then, with occasional deviations, the weather becomes fine, when the islands suffer from hurricanes, not felt on the main-land; and this is one reason among others, why the cacao or chocolate tree (a very weakly plant) thrives and bears so much better on the main, than in any of the islands. It is true, Vernon got a dusting at this season, off Carthagená; but, I understand, such weather seldom occurs at this time of the year, any where along the coast.

To prevent our agricultural pursuits from being neglected at this important season, I was under the necessity of issuing an order as to the number of persons, each day, that could be permitted to despoil the wrecks; desiring them to arrange among themselves who were to go, and who were to remain; and as to dividing the proceeds obtained. And I was happy enough, thus to secure the interest of the settlement, without exciting murmurs among the people; not at present an easy task, for they were daily obtaining articles of considerable value from the Spanish ships. But all that floated on shore of itself, became my property in right of my grant; which my servants collected from time to time, and either brought home, or piled up in appropriate places. I believe the wrecks also, as they lay upon the reefs, were droits to me; but I rather chose to wave the question, and give them up to the people, insisting only on the drift that came on shore.

About the middle of the month, the Francis Drake returned from Jamaica. This vessel had been detained by the bad weather, which set in there before Christmas-day; and we were sorry to learn that the Tom Cod had not reached Kingston, even when she sailed. The schooner brought letters in answer to my despatches; in which some compliments were paid to us on our gallant defence, and a sort of promise made, that Lieutenant Drake should have promotion on the arrival of the frigate. But no soldiers could be sent; General Wentworth having taken all the disposeable troops with him. Neither could anything be done at Jamaica, relative to getting a commission for Craig, in the King's service.—“Well! well!” I said, when I read these letters, “it matters not. Our God has been our deliverer! I will confide our destinies to him; and I feel assured the Spaniards will never try their fortune here again.” Mr. Rowley, and my dear wife, both applauded my feeling, and the resolution I had expressed on the occasion; and I can honestly say, I suffered no disappointment from the tenor of my letters from the authorities in Jamaica, except in my failure with respect to Craig.

In consequence of the wrecking business still going on, Drake was not able to navigate the prize to Jamaica, till late in February; and then he could only manage it, by a condition of taking a great load of merchandise in her, belonging to our merchants; all of whose sailors were, on those terms, lent to him. The frigate having been put in seaworthy condition, Drake presented me with her long-boat and pinnace; and on the 26th of February, sailed with her for Jamaica, under convoy of the Porghee.

He arrived in about ten days at Port Royal, without any accident. The naval officers there, had been long looking out for this Spanish frigate, as an object for promotion. Drake says they crowded round the Porghee, in their boats, as he came in with his prize, casting an eye on the large Spanish ensign, as it blew out under a St. George's jack; and as he passed under the stern of the ship that had the guard that day, the Captain hailed him,—“What do you mean, sir, by hoisting a St. George's flag on board the prize?”—“They are our island colours, sir,” he replied. When he told me this, I wished to have witnessed a sight so honourable to my most esteemed friend, and to myself. The circumstances under which the frigate had been captured, were well known; and therefore his answer as to the St. George's jack, was understood and received. But when he went on board the flag-ship, to report his arrival officially, he was under the necessity of explaining the manner in which he had been able to man the prize; and that in consequence he must be permitted to move her up to Kingston, to discharge the cargo belonging to the merchants, who had on that condition lent their men to navigate her. On the following day the prize was ordered to proceed to Kingston, to put out the cargo; and when this was done, the frigate was moved down to Greenwich. After some days, a survey took place. She was valued at 16,000*l.*, and purchased for his Majesty's service; her name not only being changed, but reversed; being now called "The Inconstant." Prophetic, no doubt; for she was wrecked soon after, on the Grand Caymans.

Drake received 14,000*l.* in treasury bills, on behalf of the captors; the head-money being yet forthcoming; 2000*l.* of the purchase-money having been deducted as the eighth alleged to be the right of the Commander in Chief at Jamaica. This would have been a small matter to complain of; but my gallant friend was juggled out of the promotion he so well had earned, and therefore so justly claimed. "Sir Chaloner Ogle was sorry he was obliged to give it to certain officers, sent out from England by the Admiralty; but he would recommend Lieutenant Drake to Lord Winchelsea, the first-lord of the Admiralty, for a sloop of war at some future period."

I was much vexed by the treatment our brave defender met with at Jamaica; but it gave me some consolation, to perceive that he did not take it deeply to heart. When speaking on this subject, he made this reflection:—"If I had got the promotion I desired, I must have been removed from Seaward Islands, which contain every thing dear to me on earth. Besides," added he, "I have made an ample fortune by prize money; so by and by, perhaps, we may all go to Old England together; where I will hoist my pendant on the chimney top of some good house; with you for my neighbours, and dear Maria for my first-lieutenant."

My brother and Van Kempen purchased 8000*l.* worth of the government bills, which enabled me to distribute four-eighths of the prize money immediately: viz. three eighths among the seamen and privates of the train-band, which gave 159½ dollars to each man; one-eighth among eight non-commissioned and petty officers and twelve artillery-men; the former having a double share, 600 dollars each, the latter 300 dollars each. The remaining 6000*l.* in bills, was just equal to pay the other three-eighths; but we could not convert them into dollars: one-eighth, among Lieutenant Craig, and Van Kempen, Doctor Gordon, and the chaplain, Mr. Rowley; gave them each an interest of 500*l.*, or 2100 dollars each, in the bills; and one-eighth between Captain Seaward and Lieutenant Drake—the latter sharing as a land captain—1000*l.*, or 4200 dollars each: and I, who perhaps deserved least, had the most in right of my situation—which, however, is quite in unison with the general tenor of human affairs—my share being one entire eighth, viz. 2000*l.*, or 8400 dollars. It was agreed among the parties concerned, that the bills should be sent to my bankers in London, with instructions to place the sums respectively to the credits of the individuals, according to the amounts endorsed on a paper accompanying them. I was glad of this arrangement, as it would secure a little something in England for those I wished well, and might prove an inducement to them—I mean Craig, the Doctor, and dear Mr. Rowley—to add something from time to time to the amount of this investment.

The great quantity of spars, and every kind of timber, and iron bolts, and canvass, and ropes, with a thousand other things, that had been recovered from the wrecks of the Spanish ships, induced Allwood, and some others, to go to Jamaica, and bring back with them half a dozen ship carpenters; so that in a little time there were two fine vessels on the stocks, and one smaller one, and several boats. The smaller vessel, was the speculation of Xavier and Derrick; who were much attached to each other, and in whose welfare I took a lively interest; the former, Diego's compeer—the latter, once my honest and faithful bondman.

In the course of this year, four negro men and four negro women, whom I had brought from Kingston, in bondage, seven years ago, were emancipated. It also occurred, that seventeen white families, amounting to fifty-three souls, arrived here in the Mary, from Bristol—driven from England by the pressure of the times incident to the severe winter of 1739-40, and which was still felt among the small farmers and peasantry, and many others. Every exertion was made to locate these people; and as many houses had been completed before their arrival, in the street crossing the woodland region, I found little difficulty in providing them with present habitations in the village. But, eventually, some of them were sent to German Town, and some to Allwood's Bay, to occupy allotments laid out for them, where buildings for their dwellings are now well advanced; it being intended that four families only, remain at St. George's.

Among the refugees, there happened to be a man and his wife of the name of Simmonds, who had kept school in Worcestershire. I was happy in profiting by this circumstance, to release Mr. Rowley from the fatigue he kindly had imposed on himself, in teaching the children. I therefore set about erecting a house for the schoolmaster, adjoining the school, at the further end of the isthmus; and soon placed him and his wife there, with an understanding that the people were now to pay for the education of their families, every one having become rich enough to do so.

In addition to these my country people, we also had a gradual accession of thirty-nine sailors, to our strength; several individuals of the former crews, having married and fixed themselves on shore. Our vessels were constantly going or coming; and sometimes a stranger brought in, and took away a cargo; so that activity and prosperity seemed to pervade the settlement, by increasing numbers and by increasing industry. The village, the while, was progressively extending, and the workmen getting on rapidly towards completing the church.

The May rains came heavily this year, and continued for nearly two weeks. In June several persons fell sick, and my beloved wife was among the number: she suffered a severe attack of remittent fever, from which she recovered slowly and imperfectly. There were some deaths; among whom we had to register Mrs. Margaret Reynolds and her child, and five individuals from among those lately arrived. But we had to lament the loss of our faithful and much-loved Rota, whose death much affected both Lady Seaward and myself. Poor Diego took it much to heart: he never held up his head for many weeks after this painful event, but sat silently on the seat before his door, with his eyes fixed on the ground. We all did our best to divert or console him under his affliction; but time only succeeded in doing so; little by little he came forth, gradually and almost imperceptibly resuming his former occupations.

Before the end of the year, the church was finished; my uncle's brig having brought out 20,000 Welsh slates, with her other investments for the settlement, at the time the seventeen refugee families arrived. When the building was completed, the accounts were made up. It appeared there was a sum of 3450 dollars to be provided for, although the 2000 that remained of my share of the pirates' booty had been expended on it. I addressed the people on this subject after divine service, under the sacred canopy of the venerable tree, where we were now assembled for the last time.

After making the statement, I proposed that each male person should contribute according to his means. On which the boatswain of the Porghee stood forward, and spoke for the rest, saying—"Our people, sir, would like to have it said they built a church, and so we are ready to pay for it." I thanked him; but requested Mr. Reynolds to take a pencil, and a list of the adult male population, got ready for the occasion, and call us over by name, adding—"What shall I put down for you?"—I, Edward Seaward, stood first on the list—put down 1000 dollars; then followed Captain Seaward, 500; Captain Drake, 500; Mr. Van Kempen, 500; Doctor Gordon, 100; poor dear Mr. Rowley, 100;—and this subscription was followed up by a spirit and liberality in every individual, so great, that I was obliged to restrain many, who could not afford to give what they desired; no one offering less than 10 dollars. 4000 dollars were now subscribed, and the money paid down the next day. I thanked the people for their liberality, and especially the Porghee's crew, for their most generous offer, saying, I was quite satisfied with what they had done in a general way. I now stated to the assembly, that the church would be consecrated and opened on the following Sunday, by the name of St. George's Church, and that it would be expedient to provide comfortably for the minister. I therefore proposed, to that end, that every male person exceeding twenty years of age, should annually make him an offering of three dollars, and as much more as he might think fit, according to his circumstances, not exceeding one doubloon; the time for doing which, I thought, would be in the week immediately after Easter-day; and this annual offering was to be received in lieu of tithes, baptism, marriage, and burial fees. The people gave their assent, one by one, as their names were called over; which act was transferred to the Island Register. Mr. Rowley and myself now returned home, much pleased with the people, and our success.

We observed Christmas-day this year with an important improvement. At nine o'clock all the boats in the settlement assembled at the landing-place below Fort George, each having a flag in the bow. I then embarked in my barge, with the St. George's flag, and led the procession to Woodland Bay, where we landed precisely at the foot of George Street, at the upper extremity of which the church is built. The tower, surmounted by a cross, (I hope my Protestant brethren will take no offence,) directly faced us; the altar being to the east. As we left the beach, the newly made fountain, seen playing at the intersection of the streets, added much to the impression imparted by the view of our holy edifice. In a hot climate, water, pure water, may be esteemed an emblem even of heavenly enjoyment—and so it is represented both in our Holy Scriptures, and in the Alcoran. The people were all well dressed, and the procession advanced, the St. George's flag foremost. Every township or family, as might be, carrying the flag of their boat before them. I foresaw, in this institution, a splendid annual pageant, perfectly innocent, and likely to do much good, by exciting a spirit of honest emulation in making a fine appearance; and, in some measure, superseding the revels of former years, which I had found to be productive of some evil. However, they were not deprived of their amusements. The isthmean games were intended to be permanent: but no feast was given by me; justly alleging as a reason, that the settlement had become too populous to continue it. Some, therefore, went home before the evening closed in, and some remained in the village, until the drum beat off at nine o'clock.

CHAPTER XVI.

BEFORE the year closed, I began to think seriously of returning to England, as my beloved wife did not regain either her strength or her spirits. Besides, I could evidently perceive she no longer desired that we should remain here. Sometimes she would say—"The child is grown up; we may now leave it to itself." Sometimes—"I think, dear Edward, you may confide the government of the settlement, safely to Captain Drake:" and sometimes, when her spirits were very low, she would say—"Let us go home to Hartland, Edward, and finish our days in peace; there is now nothing here but bustle and anxiety." These, and corresponding considerations, induced me to make up my mind for quitting the colony early in the February of the next year, and to leave Drake my lieutenant-governor and captain-commandant.

With this object in view, various arrangements were entered on. The first, and perhaps not least important of which, was to have a distinct clearance in money matters with every person on the island. This in some cases was extremely perplexing; and most frequently I was under the necessity of conceding much, both in bondsmen's labour, timber, provisions, and other matters, before I could close the account at all to the satisfaction of the opposite party; thus generally making a considerable sacrifice. But this state of things arose out of our peculiar situation: I was always doing something for the advancement of the settlement; taking my chance of being at the whole expense, or of receiving a partial remuneration in some way or other at a future time. I, therefore, in settling with many persons, gave up large portions of my right. However, before the 31st of December, balances were struck and paid, and receipts passed, between myself and every individual on the island.

In looking into public affairs, I was happy to find at the expiration of the year (the salaries and other charges on our revenue being paid up), that the sum of 2520 dollars remained in the hands of the fiscal. In consequence of this easy state of our finances, and taking into consideration the prosperous condition of our trade and the riches of the people, I issued a warrant, by which "the clergyman should still receive his 50%. a-year, besides the Easter offering; and that Doctor Gordon might be at liberty to charge moderately for his medicine and attendance, in addition to his salary, still receiving as heretofore his pay as fiscal; also that Town-major, Lieutenant, and Adjutant Craig, should have one dollar per diem, as pay in full for all his offices; and that M'Nabb, Andrews, and Finlayson (Lieutenant Craig's former comrades), should have a halberd each, with $2\frac{1}{2}$ pistarines, viz. 5 ryals, as their daily pay: the artillery-men to have their island pay continued for one year more; their sergeant's, permanently: and labourer's wages, viz. 2 ryals a day, to be paid to the negro canoe-man at Pirates' Fort, now Frazer's Fort;" which name it received after the defeat of the Spanish, in honour of the skilful engineer, to whose good advice, under Heaven, we owed the preservation of the island on that occasion.

I now turned my attention to my own revenues, beginning with my cotton plantation at Long Bay; which yielded so well that I received an offer of 300 dollars a year from the settlers at Pirates' Land, for its produce, which I accepted. I next let Eastfield to Gortz, with all the sheep thereon, viz. 220, at a rent of 440 dollars a-year; he being required to keep the same number of sheep always on that place, and the adjoining hills. The turtle fisheries were let to Rock and Stone, at 500 dollars a-year; and it appeared that I was likely to get a handsome revenue by Vicente, the Panama pearl-diver; who already had taken some very large oysters from the rocks in deep water, affording a few fine pearls, specimens of what we might expect: of the produce of this fishery I laid claim to one-third. These rents, and some others of less value, I placed at the disposal of Captain Drake, to be expended, if absolutely required, in the public service; but to be remitted to me, if he could get on without them.

1744.—The annual tempest passed away this season with little more evidence of its presence than an abundance of rain. We often reflected during this period on the kind providence of our God, who had so ordered all things, that it was not now the Spaniards should come to destroy us. After the rains ceased, and the weather became settled, I proposed to my dear Eliza, for us to visit every individual settler on the islands leisurely, day after day, to ascertain their condition ere we bade them farewell. We did this, and had ample reason to be gratified by observing the cleanliness, satisfaction, and abundance, that everywhere appeared.

The month of February arrived. I now arranged definitely with my friend Drake, as to the terms on which he was to assume the government. I desired that he should occupy the mansion as I had done, and give up his house and grounds to Mr. Rowley; appointing his senior officer to the ordinary command of the yacht. "There is a fine herd of deer in the Woodland Park, my dear friend," said I; "we have not as yet tasted the venison: but I do not desire you to abstain from doing so; only preserve the breed. I will endeavour to take two pairs of them with me to Hartland."

When my dear wife talked to Rosalie about making preparations for departure, she simpered and hesitated; and after a little more nonsense, acknowledged that she had engaged herself in marriage to Mr. Reynolds. On the matter being mentioned to me, I sent for him, and he avowed the truth. "Well, sir," I said, "it may be indelicate in me to press the matter, as you have not lost your wife quite twelve months; but I must either take Miss Filibert back with us, or leave her here your wife. In short, unless she is your wife before we sail, I must take her along with us." He answered respectfully, he would speak to the lady on the subject, and let me know. Much time was not required to settle the business; so on that day week Mr. Rowley tied the indissoluble knot. Reynolds had been steady, and had made some money; besides, he had received gracious letters from his father, to whose estate he was heir. I therefore could make no objection to the match on behalf of Rosalie. When settling the business of the nuptials, he offered to pay me a moiety of his bond; but I desired him to defer it another year, as otherwise he might cramp his means of trade. On the day of the marriage, Lady Seaward gave the bride 500 dollars, as a compensation for her services during the seven years she had been with us; and she afterwards added to this, some little valuables, as a mark of her esteem.

One morning, just as we came into the hall to breakfast, Diego, who had been anxiously standing there to see us, put the palm of his hand upon his head, looking at us with an unusual vacancy, like one bereaved of hope. He said—"Lady mine, and honoured master, I hear, soon you leave us. Diego then glad, for go rest with Rota." My Eliza did not give me time to answer him;—"We will never leave you, nor forsake you, faithful Diego," she replied: "if you will choose to go with us, our home shall be your home; but England is a cold climate." Diego looked at me. "Come with us to England, Master Diego," said I, "and I will do all in my power to make you comfortable."—"Thank you, Sir Edward! thank you too, my Lady!" exclaimed Diego: then lowering his voice, he said—"Rota loved my Lady;" and then the old man wept—"but Rota," continued he, "is gone to Heaven, and Diego will go anywhere with his kind lady, and Master Sir Edward."

When it was known that Mademoiselle was to be married, there were many persons, both black and white, desirous of accompanying my wife to England as her maid; but she declined taking any one. Having expressed her opinion to me, that a female attendant, unaccustomed to be at sea, was worse than useless on board ship; and that on her arrival in England, any woman brought from the settlement would only be an incumbrance; "I think you are right, dear," I replied; "besides, women are already rather deficient here in numbers, and it would not be well, unnecessarily, to take even one away."

A few days before the time fixed on for our departure, Mr. Rowley gave me 1500 dollars, which he had saved since his arrival in the island; being nearly the amount of his entire salary for the whole period: but he had received some gifts, and had not been at any expense worth mentioning. He requested me to send the dollars to my banker in London; and desire him to invest the amount thereof, together with the 500*l.* his interest in the large government bill, in such public securities as might be deemed advisable. I met his request with much pleasure; and was most happy in seeing this little investment likely to be made, as a something in reserve for himself or family.

On the same day Doctor Gordon called on me with a similar request, but propounded in a very different manner:—"He would like to send some money to England, to be invested in the public funds, if I would see the business done at an advantageous time, so as not to lose the possibility of a fall by any inconsiderate precipitancy." He then went into the merits and demerits of the different stocks; about which he had a great deal to say, having seen "The Chronicle" lately sent out to us; making so many pros, and cons, and contras, about the determinate mode of investing the money, that, notwithstanding the great respect I entertained for him, I felt myself obliged to decline having any thing to do with it. "Well, then, Sir Edward," he said, "if you will not meddle with the money,—and here it is in four bags, out by, in the piazza, just 3000 dollars, and 1000 pieces of eight,—I suppose you will have no objection to my putting it into business here, if I like."—"O, none at all," I replied.—"Well," he rejoined, "I'll see about it;" moving away at the same time to the great door, where his man, William Wallace, stood guarding the bags. "Give me twa o' the bags, Wully," said he, "and you tak the other twa; so we'll e'en go back we' them again." Finding that Wallace was there, I took the opportunity of reminding the Doctor, in the presence of his bondman, that this was the year of his jubilee. "I know that right well, sir;" he replied, a little testily; "but I think the man may choose to stay where he is just, if he knows when he is well off." Saying this, he departed with his bags under his arms, followed by William Wallace similarly laden; evidently not in very good humour, but talking to the fellow in broad Scotch, which he always did: and to say the truth, he had taught his man Wully to speak so much like himself, that if it were not for his colour, you might mistake him for a descendant of the patriot whose name he bore.

Before my departure I had several conferences with Van Kempen; the chief object of which was, to know how the additional vessels now building could find employment. He said, "If there were to be as many more, they could be employed; there was scarcely any bounds to the trade of an entrepôt."—"Then tell me, Mr. Van Kempen," asked I, "what is required of me, towards fostering this commerce?"—"In ordinary cases," he replied, "it might be necessary to take off the ad valorem duty; but where the profits are so large, and the facilities of trade so great, it will not be felt."—"Then, is there any thing whatever for me to do?" I rejoined. "Yes; to let us alone!" he replied, significantly: "that is all we require of the Governor." I allowed this reply to be conclusive; believing I saw in it the secret of that commercial ascendancy, which, at different times, had obtained in places of not much greater territorial extent than Seaward Islands.

My brother and his wife saw us often, both at their own house and at the mansion, ever since I had made up my mind to return to England. At one time, they had some thoughts of accompanying us; and my brother said he certainly would have done so, "but the loss of the Tom Cod was 3000*l.* out of his pocket; yet as soon as he could make up that loss, and perhaps realize a very little more, he assuredly would retire from business, as he had now got together nearly 20,000*l.*" Mrs. Seaward of late, evinced more feeling and affection for her sister, than I had before witnessed in her; but my sister

Maria (Mrs. Drake), not only now, but on all occasions, was the kindest and most affectionate of friends. Mr. and Mrs. Rowley, too, were ever ready to cheer or amuse her. But it was on me she leaned for every earthly comfort. "You are all to me, dear Edward," she would say—"you are all I desire on earth, to solace or to cheer me."

A few days before I sailed, Drake and I were closeted all the forenoon, making final arrangements. We wrote out a memorial, from him, to the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, and another to the King; setting forth what he had done for his Majesty's service, at Porto Bello, and in the capture of vessels of superior force, and in the defence of these islands; praying for a promotion in the navy, to the rank of Master and Commander. The memorial to the King was not to be presented, unless the other should fail in its object. He then received from my hand an outline of our laws, or rather regulations; also a body of instructions for his conduct in all public matters, conceived and written down rather in the spirit, than in the letter, of what I should require. I then gave him some memoranda as to my private interests in the island; especially with respect to the timber, which was not to be cut down without leave, and then to be paid for, at a valuation, by those who wanted it. I then presented to him his commission as Lieutenant-Governor, and Captain-Commandant of Seaward Islands.

On this day all our friends dined with us; and, before they took their leave, all of them confided to my care numerous letters for England. Among the rest, Doctor Gordon, having "thought about it," pulled a large packet from his waistcoat pocket, saying—"Sir Edward, I know I am a little fasheous; but I hope you will not impute it to any disrespectful intention to yourself, who I am free to acknowledge to be a most honourable and trustworthy man. And so, to make a long business short, if you will just be good enough to take charge of this letter for your bankers in London, with my four bags of money—which I will duly send you to-morrow morning, and which have been sealed, and nailed up in a double case, in the presence of Mr. Van Kempen—I cannot but say, you will lay me under a great obligation.” I held out my hand to receive the packet; then taking a part of the Doctor’s speech, for the greater part of my reply, I said—“To make a long business short, I will do it.” The Doctor seemed now as much pleased, as he had been otherwise on the former occasion. And it afforded me no less pleasure, to think I should, by this act, not leave an unpleasant feeling behind me in the breast of this eccentric, but truly honest man.

Drake employed our few remaining days in making accommodation for the deer, and a large supply of sea-stock for our ultimate voyage, to be put on board the schooner; all the other things we intended to take with us, being packed and ready. On Saturday afternoon the whole was embarked.

On Sunday, the 12th of February, after coming out of church, we took a general and affectionate leave of all the people; myself addressing a few parting words, I may say, of parental exhortation to them; which were answered by the tears of many, and bows of reverence from all. My dear wife wept too; and as she passed, every lip blessed her: sobs now became audible around us: then waving my hand kindly to them, I pulled my hat over my own eyes, and hastened forward. Early the next morning, our household were all assembled in the hall: we distributed some appropriate presents among them; and then we tenderly kissed the children. Our nearest and dearest friends next appeared; and accompanied by them, and attended by Diego, we left the mansion. Eliza leaned on my arm, and grasped it hard as we walked along. She looked down, with an agitated colour on her cheek; but a sweet smile was on her mouth, which told me, though she felt a natural emotion at quitting the place—perhaps for ever—yet happiness was in her heart. Diego carried Fidele in his arms; the dear little animal having grown too fat, in his old age, to run beside us. When arrived at the shore, we bade an affectionate but firm adieu to the attached friends and relations we were about to leave behind us, and embarked without any difficulty. The beach was lined with our late servants, and the people, standing at various distances in groups, to see the last of us.

In compliment to me and to our islands, Drake hoisted the St. George's flag at the fore; and all the boats of the settlement, with their flags flying, escorted us out of the harbour. When fairly out, we set our top-gallant sails, and hauled down our colours, which was the signal for the boats to return; they did so, but without a cheer. Their silence was a better compliment; it evinced their sorrowful feeling on the occasion.

When our vessel had proceeded some distance, and the islands had receded far, my beloved looked steadily and mournfully on the shadowy land;—"Farewell!" she said, and sighed deeply. "You sigh, love," I exclaimed: "we leave the people rich and happy; and our dear friend here," alluding to Drake, "will take good care of them."—"It was the recollection of former days," she replied, "that drew forth that sigh—the recollection of the time when that land was to me an earthly paradise."

On the fifth day we came in sight of Port Royal, just as a convoy for England, with three ships of war, were standing out of the harbour. Drake instantly suspected what they were; and after conferring with me for a few minutes, made a whiff in his ensign; the signal to speak the Commodore, who was distinguished by a broad pendant. On the signal being answered, the Porghee ran up on his quarter. Drake then hailed him—"This is Sir Edward Seaward's yacht. He is on board, and on his way to Kingston, to take a passage in a merchant ship to England." The Commodore very politely hove to, and sent a boat on board, offering me a passage in his ship; at the same time informing me that the fleet would anchor in Blue Fields' Bay, at the west end of the island, and remain there a few days. I returned the Commodore my best thanks, saying, "In that case, we would keep company with the convoy; and I would, on arriving at Blue Fields, be able to make further arrangements."

It was a fine sight, to see so many ships together. We ran down before the wind, between the Pedro Shoals and the land; and the next day came to, in Blue Fields' Bay. As soon as the fleet anchored, I went with Drake, to pay my respects to the Commodore, who, on meeting me, cordially repeated his invitation; which I politely declined, on account of the delicate state of Lady Seaward's health. Before evening, Drake contrived to secure a passage for me in the Severn, one of the finest ships out of Bristol; and before night he had put all our packages on board, which were numerous, large, and heavy. He agreeably surprised the Captain, with our good supply of sheep and poultry, and other sea-stores: but there was some demur about taking the deer; which at last he consented to do; contriving a place in the long-boat for them on deck. Diego bought some fine fresh shaddocks and other fruits, on shore, while these matters were transacting; also some provender for the sheep and deer.

As I wished the Porghee to return as quickly as possible to the Seaward Islands, I explained our situation to the Commodore; to whom, as Drake's commanding officer, the compliment was due. And on the following day our inestimable friend bade my dear wife and myself an affectionate adieu: shaking Master Diego cordially by the hand, not forgetting to say—"Good-by, Fidele!" he left us on board the Severn; and with an emotion not to be described, we saw our dear little vessel fill her sails and go.

On the next day the whole fleet got under weigh, steering to the westward. Our faithful Diego had always shown how useful he would prove to us, by the care he had taken to see all our packages stowed away, and those we might want placed in our state room. My dear wife and myself thought it would be expedient, now, to call him by the English equivalent for Diego, viz. James, to prevent the possibility of his Spanish name exposing him to jests or even affronts; and we took the earliest opportunity of imparting this to him. He had sense enough to comprehend the matter, and expressed himself obliged by our forethought. "Then, Master Sir Edward," said he, "if you please, my name is Diego James."—"Just so, Master Diego," I replied; "but Mr. James for the mouths of strangers."—"And for their ears too," added my considerate Eliza, "when we speak of you to them." It was not our intention to treat this worthy man as a menial, although he was quite disposed to do all that could be required of one; therefore I stipulated that he should mess with the second-mate, and I allowed him a supply from my own sea-stores and stock, to make him a welcome messmate.

The breeze was steady, and the weather continued fine, until we got into the Gulf of Florida. It then became hazy, and even foggy, which made it not only disagreeable but dangerous; the convoy being obliged to keep close together for fear of the Spanish cruisers, or row-boats cutting off vessels; which they always do from a straggling fleet. Yet, in spite of this caution, one or two of our merchantmen were taken; the men-of-war being kept constantly on the alert, every now and then having a brush with the enemy.

The Editor has to lament, that, from this point, seventy-three pages of the original manuscript are missing; that is, from page 630 to page 704 in the old MS. Only four subsequent pages have been found; and they appear to have been intended to close the Journal. It seems so, not only from the numbering figures in the pages, but from the dates of the years, which uniformly are added at the top of every page. The 704th page is headed 1749; and bears so satisfactorily on the former most interesting subjects of the narrative, that the Editor ventures to hope the additional Chapter will prevent any actual disappointment in the reader's mind, concerning the safe arrival of the homeward-bound party, in England; and it also shows their subsequent happy domestic residence at Sir Edward's seat in Gloucestershire, from the year of his return—namely, 1744—until his being called to London on public business, five years after—that is, in the year 1749—when the narrative here recommences, and finishes with the fate of Seaward Islands.

CHAPTER XVII.

“It will answer no good purpose, sir,” he replied; “but the contrary. Mr. Pelham has been perfectly explicit, and I can have nothing more to say on the subject.”—“It is not my wish, my Lord Duke,” I observed, “to create any unnecessary vexation to his Majesty’s government; but I have a duty to perform in another quarter. I cannot suffer the people to be treated in this manner, abandoned like dogs, without seeking that redress to which they are entitled; and I do feel that it is my duty to have this business brought before parliament, if we are to be thus sacrificed.”—“I tell you, Sir Edward Seaward,” he replied, “that the thing is done. Mr. Pelham has already told you so. Those islands, or rocks, or whatever they are, must be delivered up immediately to the crown of Spain.”

On hearing this, I determined to make one effort more to impress his Grace with the importance of my request. “The court of Spain, my Lord Duke,” said I, “knows the importance of the place, though perhaps you may not. During the war, the commanders both at Carthage and Porto Bello, were ordered to take those islands; and they tried to do so; but we defeated their first expedition,—some of their ships being captured, some destroyed, and those that escaped were roughly handled. The next expedition, which was sufficiently formidable to attack the best of our West India Islands, suffered shipwreck on our shores; and with their remains we built vessels, and pursued a lucrative commerce, already established. Whether we contemplate Seaward Islands in a naval or commercial point of view, they are of no small importance; and the Spaniard knows it. The place is close to the track of his homeward-bound galleons. It is an entrepôt by which his sullen commercial policy is neutralised: flags of all nations, including his own, resort there. Our merchants dispense millions of the produce of British industry and commerce, from that spot, to foreigners; they have sent their gains to England,—much of which, perhaps one hundred thousand pounds altogether, derived from those islands, has been vested in the public funds. Messrs. Perry and Co., sir,” continued I, “can vouch for the truth of this last statement.” The Duke bit his lip: but not speaking, I went on. “But there is another point, sir;—the claims of the people. They have made the place what it is. It is respectably fortified: it never cost the English government one shilling to do it. Can you tell me, my Lord Duke, where I can find another spot under the Crown, that can put in the same claim? They have brought the land into a garden-like cultivation; they have built a little town, with a fine church in it; they are formed into a community; and they are ready to defend themselves against all invaders. Leave us to ourselves, my Lord Duke; do not interfere. Say that you will not interfere, and I will go and raise one thousand men at my own expense, and I will put the Spaniard at defiance.”

All the compliment I can pay to the Duke on the occasion is, that he kept silence while I spoke, and that he changed colour two or three times while I made this strong appeal; but it ended in his cool reply—“Sir Edward Seaward, I tell you again, the thing is done, and the place must forthwith be delivered up to the crown of Spain. There will be 10,000*l.* forthcoming for your indemnification, as I told you before; and that is 8000*l.* more than we dare charge on the business. Why will you be so troublesome?—the Island of Rattan has been already given up, and every other place, agreeable to the convention, excepting these abominable rocks of yours.”—“This being your determination, my Lord Duke,” I replied, “with your permission I take my leave.” He rose and bowed: I took my hat, bowing in return, but as a cavalier would do when he would give his antagonist to understand—“Sir, we meet again.”

After I left the Secretary of State, my mind was so absent from the present, that I saw nothing in passing, until I arrived in Bruton Street. My ever dear and affectionate wife anxiously awaited my return. In a moment she read in my countenance, that things still went on counter. She did not speak to me, but led me to a chair, and sat down by me, still holding my hand in hers. In less than a minute she arose; taking her cambric pocket-handkerchief from her pocket, and seating herself on my knee, began to rub my forehead; and having done this a little while, during which I found my blood circulate more freely, she kissed both my eyes, one after the other, saying—“My dear Edward, if it were in your Eliza’s power to make you happy in all things, you should not thus suffer.”—“O, my love, it is too much,” I replied, “to see our people treated like dogs, and turned over to the Spaniards, without security, or even stipulation.”—“Yes, my honoured husband,” she softly answered, “it is indeed grievous; and I am not surprised to see you thus oppressed, and even indignant; but, my dear Edward,” continued she, pressing my hand, “let us look at the foundation of your grief in detail. I admit that, taking it altogether, it cannot do otherwise than vex and distress you; but let us examine it more closely. As to the loss the Crown may sustain in giving up the place, that is their business, my Edward: as to the loss you yourself will suffer, I am sure you care nothing about it. Now, as to the people; your brother is in England, with his family; Drake is rich, and I should think would be happy to retire from a situation now full of anxiety; Van Kempen, you know, has said in a late letter, he intended to go to Amsterdam; Doctor Gordon has saved plenty of money; Mr. Rowley has remitted a good deal; Mr. Reynolds has returned to England, to enjoy his paternal estate; all the new merchants are personal strangers to us; and as to the other people, those whom you found slaves, you ultimately made free; and every one who came there under your auspices, is rich in money; even if the government should persist in taking from them their lands and place of habitation. All these people, my dear Edward," continued she, "are in a condition to shift for themselves; and not one of them, I believe, will grieve half so much at the change that is awaiting them, as you now are doing for their sakes. The time was, when I would have grieved with you,—when the settlement was our nursing-child; but that is no longer the case; every one is wealthy, and, if scattered abroad, they are as able to take care of themselves as we are. They have not that attachment to the place that you have; they will soon find another home, and be satisfied. Drake will return, with his dear wife and family; most likely, Mr. Rowley will come to England also; poor dear Rota is no more; Diego is with us; Xavier and his family, wherever they go, will make it out very well." Then putting her arms round my neck, she finished by saying—"Besides, it is God's will, my dear Edward, in the dispensations of his providence, that our islands should again become a desert:"—as she said this, she wept;—"and it is his will," continued she, "I hope, that we shall be resigned; and your own Eliza will endeavour to be your earthly paradise."

I was overpowered and confounded; her kindness overpowered me, her reasonings confounded me; but it was always in this way that my guardian angel delivered me from perplexity and vexation.

My perturbed mind, and agitated feelings, soon felt the smoothing influence of my Eliza's consolations, which, like oil cast upon the sea, breaks the power of the wind that would stir it into surge and billows. Thus softened down, and while enjoying something like a return of holy peace within, I had a visit from the Earl of Harrington. He smiled as he shook hands with me, and as usual said some fine things to Lady Seaward; but I perceived he was not quite at ease. In a few minutes he said—"My dear Sir Edward, I have called on you, as your friend, to advise you to make the best you can of it with the minister; conceding the point. The fact is, the government is pledged to the Crown of Spain, to deliver up the islands; and it must be done. I have even spoken to the King on the subject; but, I am sorry to say, he showed some displeasure at my interference. 'Tell Sir Edward Seaward,' said his Majesty, 'the place must be given up immediately; and he may consider it a mark of favour to himself, that I prevent his deputy-governor, Captain Drake, from being brought to a court-martial, for resisting the authorities that have been sent, to take possession of it for the King of Spain.'"—"Indeed, I am sorry," returned I, "the King has been brought to see the case in this light; but I will be guided by you, my Lord. I have pointed out the situation and value of the place to his Majesty's ministers, and yet they persist in their decision: however, I am not surprised that men, who did not know that Cape Breton was an island, should be so ignorant as to think that Seaward Islands lay off the harbour of Porto Bello. But the thing is done, I am told, and I must submit; will you, therefore, my dear friend, see the minister, and tell him that I submit to the order of government, but that I expect he will appoint a commissioner to carry the business into execution, and that he will order him to confer with me on its details? My only wish now is, that the people should be removed with that degree of consideration, which is due to the sacrifice they are called upon to make, for the honour of those who signed or ratified the treaty that expels them. I expect that a proper settlement will be given, for such as may choose to go to the Mosquito shore, on the terms proposed to me by Mr. Pelham. Likewise say, that I shall expect the 10,000*l.* offered to me, and which I will place at the disposal of Captain Drake, for the necessities of the people; and after that, if there should remain any part of it unappropriated, I will receive it as a small compensation for all the money I have laid out in making those islands what they are.”—“I think this will be acceded to, Sir Edward,” replied Lord Harrington; then, after a little explanatory conversation, he took his leave.

On the morrow Mr. Pitts, who had been Governor of Rattan, waited on me from the minister, with full powers to arrange every thing for the evacuation of Seaward Islands. The forts were to be demolished, and the place then given up. Such, he said, had been the fate of Rattan, after the government had expended 15,000*l.* on its establishment. Mr. Pitts was a liberal and kind-hearted man, entering warmly into my feelings. He had been much among the Mosquito-shore Indians, and cordially undertook to procure a good settlement among them for the Seaward Island colony. We met three successive days, occupied entirely completing our arrangements; by which it was stipulated, that the people should have three months to remove from the islands, with their stock and goods, and that government should pay the island vessels for transporting them; that government should satisfy the Indians for six square miles of land, such as might be fixed on for their residence; and also grant a commission of Superintendent, to Lieutenant James Craig, with a subaltern's pay as such. All this being ratified, I sat down and wrote a long letter to my dear and inestimable friend, Captain Drake, with all necessary details. Mr. Pitts received my letter, and last instructions, with much feeling and great courtesy; he saw the struggle in my breast, when I gave it to him. He took his leave, and posted off for Plymouth, to sail instantly for the islands in a sloop of war. Our business in London being thus brought to a close—

“Now, my own Edward,” said my beloved Eliza, “let us return to Hartland, and finish our days in peace.”

THE END.
